The International Critical Commentary on the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments.

UNDER THE EDITORSHIP OF

THE REV. SAMUEL ROLLES DRIVER, D.D., D.LITT., Regius Professor of Hebrew, Oxford;

THE REV. ALFRED PLUMMER, M.A., D.D., Late Master of University College, Durham;

AND

THE REV. CHARLES AUGUSTUS BRIGGS, D.D., D.LITT.
Professor of Theological Encyclopædia and Symbolics, Union Theological Seminary, New York.
THE JOHANNINE EPISTLES

Rev. Canon A. E. Brooke, D.D.
THE INTERNATIONAL CRITICAL COMMENTARY

A CRITICAL AND EXEGETICAL COMMENTARY ON THE JOHANNINE EPISTLES

BY
REV. CANON A. E. BROOKE, D.D.
FELLOW, DEAN AND DIVINITY LECTURER, KING'S COLLEGE CAMBRIDGE

EDINBURGH
T. & T. CLARK, 38 GEORGE STREET
The following Commentary is an attempt to apply to the Johannine Epistles the method of historical interpretation, the only method of exegesis which can claim to be scientific. I do not mean by historical interpretation a series of ingenious attempts to fit the Epistles into the scheme of known facts, dates, and places of early Christian history, and to assign them, or their constituent parts, to definite persons, places, and decades. A more modest, but equally difficult task has been attempted, that of determining, in the light of our knowledge of Christian life and thought at the end of the First and beginning of the Second Century, what the writer seems to have intended his readers to understand by the words which he addressed to them. When that has been done we may permit ourselves to draw conclusions, or hazard conjectures, about the author's theology, or the value of his words for later generations. The process is possible, even, if we do not know the writer's name, or the exact place and date of his activity. The question of authorship has been deliberately avoided. It cannot be profitably discussed apart from the wider question of the date and authorship of the Fourth Gospel. But we can, I believe, determine what it was that the writer wanted to say to definite groups of men and women whom he knew, as a spiritual father to his own children in the Faith, and whose circumstances he enables us to depict, at least in outline. The method attempted carries with it one necessary result, a prominence given to matters connected with exhortation.
and edification which may seem out of proportion in a Critical Commentary. But is any other method of interpreting the Johannine Epistles scientific, or even possible? The writer may or may not have been a Theologian. Undoubtedly he was the Pastor of his Flock. His chief interest is the cure of souls. He teaches and discusses only in order that his readers "may believe, and believing have life." The meaning of his words can only be determined by the sympathetic recollection of this obvious fact. Rothe's Commentary on the First Epistle is by far the most illuminating book which has been written on the subject, even though in points of detail his explanations of particular phrases and passages are often unsatisfactory and unconvincing. Jülicher's patronising appreciation of its value is somewhat amusing, "Der wertvollste, trotz seiner erbaulichen Tendenz." The supreme merit of Rothe's really remarkable work is that his "tendency to edify" has given him sympathetic insight into the meaning and aims of a writer at least as guilty as himself of the crime of 'erbaulichen Tendenz.' He has seen, as Jülicher has not, that the writer knows to whom he is writing, and knows them well.

The preparation of this Commentary has been the παρέργον of several years in such intervals as could be spared from Septuagint and College Work. Spasmodic efforts, frequently interrupted, lead to uneven results. This is the only excuse I have to offer for want of completeness and consistency in interpretation, as well as for the late date at which the book appears.

My sincerest thanks are due to Dr. Plummer for the kind liberality with which he has interpreted the duties of Editor, and the invaluable help which I have in consequence received from him, during the period of writing as well as that of passing the sheets through the Press.

July 1912.
CONTENTS

Introduction to the Johannine Epistles | i–xc

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>§ 1.</td>
<td>The Epistles and the Gospel</td>
<td>i</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 2.</td>
<td>The Aim</td>
<td>xxvii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 3.</td>
<td>Destination</td>
<td>xxx</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 4.</td>
<td>Analysis</td>
<td>xxxii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 5.</td>
<td>The False Teachers</td>
<td>xxxviii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 6.</td>
<td>Literary History</td>
<td>lli'</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 7.</td>
<td>The Text</td>
<td>lxxi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.</td>
<td>Commentaries, etc.</td>
<td>lxxii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 9.</td>
<td>Authorship of the Second and Third Epistles</td>
<td>lxxxi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 10.</td>
<td>The Second Epistle</td>
<td>lxxvii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 11.</td>
<td>The Third Epistle</td>
<td>lxxix</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 12.</td>
<td>Historical Background of the Two Shorter Epistles</td>
<td>lxxxiv</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Notes on the First Epistle | 1
Notes on the Second Epistle | 166
Notes on the Third Epistle | 181

Appendix—The Old Latin Version | 197

Indices | 225–242

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Letter</th>
<th>Category</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>A</td>
<td>General</td>
<td>225</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>B</td>
<td>Authors and Works</td>
<td>226</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>C</td>
<td>Greek Words and Phrases Explained</td>
<td>228</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>D</td>
<td>Greek Words Used in the Epistles</td>
<td>229</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>E</td>
<td>Words Used in Gospel but Not in Epistles</td>
<td>235</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. THE EPISTLES AND THE GOSPEL.

(a) Identity of Authorship.

The discussion of the question whether the First Epistle and the Gospel are by the same author may seem to many to be almost a waste of time. The view which at first sight must seem obvious has always been maintained by the majority of scholars who have investigated the subject. The list includes men of widely divergent views, among whom Eichhorn, Credner, De Wette, Lücke, Ewald, Keim, and Huther may be mentioned. And the patent similarity of style, language, and ways of thinking between the two writings might reasonably be regarded as leaving no room for doubt. But the views of a minority of competent scholars cannot be ignored, especially as the number of those who reject the traditional view has been largely increased in modern times. Baur's view, that the explanation of the obvious connection between the two writings is to be found in imitation rather than in identity of authorship, meets with an increasing number of supporters who have a right to be heard.

The most careful and exhaustive discussion of the question is contained in H. Holtzmann's article in the Jahrbuch für Protestantische Theologie, 1882, p. 128, which forms the second of his series of articles on the "Problem of the First Epistle of S. John in its relation to the Gospel." He has collected, and stated with absolute fairness, all the evidence on the subject which can be derived from the vocabulary, style, and content of the Epistle, as compared with the Gospel. In the present section the freest use has been made of his article, and most of the lists are practically taken from his.

The list of phrases common to the two writings is very striking. An attempt has been made to bring out its true significance by a fuller quotation of the Greek in the passages which Holtzmann has collected.
THE EPISTLES OF S. JOHN

Epistle.

v. 20. ἵνα γνῶσκωμεν τὸν ἀληθινὸν.

iv. 9. τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ τὸν μονογενῆ ἀπέσταλκεν.

iv. 6. τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας.

i. 6. οὐκ ἤδωκεν τὴν ἀληθείαν.

i. 8. ή ἀλήθεια οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν ἡμῖν.

ii. 4. ἐν τούτῳ ἡ ἀλήθεια οὐκ ἔστιν.

ii. 21. ἡ ἀληθεία οὐκ ἔστιν.

iii. 19. ἡ ἀληθεία ἐσμέν.

iii. 8. ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου ἐστίν.

iii. 10. οὐκ ἔστιν ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ (cf. iv. 1-4, 6, v. 19).

iv. 7. ἡ ἀγάπη ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστίν.

iv. 16. ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου ἐστίν (cf. iv. 5).

ii. 29. ἐξ αὐτοῦ γεγένηται.

iii. 9. ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ γεγένηται (cf. iv. 7, v. 1).

v. 4. πᾶν τὸ γεγεννημένον ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ.

v. 18. ὁ γεγεννημένος ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐγεννηθεὶς ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ.

iii. 1. ἵνα τέκνα θεοῦ κληθῶμεν.

iii. 2. τὸν τέκνα θεοῦ ἐσμέν (cf. iii. 10, v. 2).

ii. 11. ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ περιπατεῖ.

i. 6. ἐν τῷ σκότει περιπατῶμεν.

iv. 20. τὸν θεόν ἐν ὅσι ἐώρακεν.

iv. 12. θεόν οὐδεὶς πῶς πεπεραταί.

Gospel.

xvii. 3. ἵνα γνῶσκωσίν σε τὸν μόνον ἀληθινὸν θεόν.

i. 14. ὃς μονογενῆς παρὰ πατρός.

i. 18. μονογενῆς θεός (v. l. ὁ μονογενὴς υἱός).

iii. 16. τὸν υἱὸν τὸν μονογενὴν ἔδωκεν.

iii. 18. τὸν μονογενὸς υἱόν τοῦ θεοῦ.

xiv. 16. ἄλλον παράκλητον... τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας (cf. xv. 26).

xvi. 13. εἶκον, τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας.

iii. 21. ὁ δὲ ποιῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν.

viii. 44. οὐκ ἔστιν ἀλήθεια ἐν αὐτῷ.

xviii. 37. πᾶς ὁ ὄν ἐκ τῆς ἀληθείας.

viii. 44. ἐκ τοῦ πατρός τοῦ διαβόλου ἐστε.

viii. 47. ὁ δὲ ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ.

vii. 17. περὶ τῆς διδαχῆς, πότερον ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστιν.

viii. 23. ὑμεῖς ἐκ τοῦ πνεύματος τῆς ἀληθείας (cf. xviii. 26).

xv. 19. ἐπὶ ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστε (cf. xv. 14, 16).

i. 13. ὁ δὲ ποιῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν.

Cf. iii. 8. ὁ γεγεννημένος ἐκ τοῦ πνεύματος.

i. 12. ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς ἐξουσίαν τέκνα θεοῦ γενέσθαι.

xi. 52. τὰ τέκνα τοῦ θεοῦ τὰ διεσκορπισμένα.

viii. 12. οὐ ἐκ τῆς σκοτίας ἐκ τῆς σκοτίας.

xii. 35. οὐ περιπατητὶ ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ.

vi. 46. οὐκ ἐκ τοῦ πατέρα ἐώρακεν τε.

i. 18. θεοὶ οὐδεὶς ἐώρακεν πῶς τοτε.
THE EPISTLES AND THE GOSPEL

EPISTLE.

iii. 16. ἐκεῖνος ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ ἔθηκεν.

i. 8. ἀμαρτίαν οὐκ ἔχομεν.

v. 13. ἵνα εἰδῆτε διὶ ἡμῶν ἐχεῖτε αἰώνιοι.

iii. 14. μεταβεβήκαμεν ἐκ τοῦ θανάτου εἰς τὴν ζωήν.

v. 4. νικᾶ τὸν κόσμον (cf. ii. 13).

v. 5. τις ἐστιν ὁ νικῶν τὸν κόσμον;

v. 9. εἰ τὴν μαρτυρίαν τῶν ἀνθρώπων λαμβάνομεν.

iii. 5. ἐκεῖνος ἐφανερώθη ἵνα τὰς ἁμαρτίας ἄρῃ.

v. 6. ἐλθὼν δι᾿ ὕδατος καὶ αἵματος (cf. v. 8).

GOSPEL.

xiv. 9. ὁ ἑωράκων ἐμὲ ἑώρακεν τὸν πατέρα.

xiv. 11. τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ τίθησιν ὑπὲρ τῶν προβάτων (cf. ver. 15).

xiv. 17. τίθημι τὴν ψυχὴν μου, ἵνα πάλιν λάβω αὐτήν.

xiv. 18. ἐξουσιάζω ἐχω θείαν.

xiii. 37. τὴν ψυχὴν μου ὑπὲρ σοῦ ἤθεσώ (cf. ver. 38, xv. 13).

ix. 41. οὐκ ἐν ἑχεῖτε ἀμαρτίαν (cf. xv. 22, 24, xix. 11).

iii. 15. ἵνα πᾶς ὁ πιστεύων ἐν αὐτῷ ἔχῃ ζωὴν αἰώνιον (cf. vv. 16, 36, v. 24, vi. 40, 47; 54).

v. 39 ὁ δοκεῖ ἐν αὐτῶν ζωὴν αἰώνιον ἔχειν.

v. 24. μεταβεβήκας ἐκ τοῦ θανάτου εἰς τὴν ζωήν.

Cf. xiii. 1. μεταβηκέν ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου τοῦ πατέρα.

xvi. 33. ἐγὼ κενίκηκα τὸν κόσμον.

iii. 33. ὁ λάβων αὐτοῦ τὴν μαρτυρίαν (cf. iii. 11).

v. 34. ἐγὼ δὲ οὐ παρὰ ἀνθρώπων τὴν μαρτυρίαν λαμβάνω.

i. 29. ὁ αἴρων τὴν ἁμαρτίαν τοῦ κόσμου.

xix. 34. ἐξάλθην εὐθὺς αἷμα αἵματα.

viii. 43. οὐ δύνασθε ἁμαρτάνειν.

v. 44. πῶς δύνασθε... πιστεύσατε;

xiv. 17. ὁ κόσμος οὐ δύναται λαβεῖν.

x. 29. ὁ πατὴρ μου ὃ δέδωκέν μοι πάντων μείζων ἐστιν (v.1 δς... μείζων).

xiv. 28. ὁ πατὴρ μείζων μοῦ ἐστιν.

viii. 53. μὴ σὺ μείζων εἶ τοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν "Ἀβραάμ;

v. 36. ἐχω τὴν μαρτυρίαν μείζων τοῦ ἴωναν.

xiv. 5. ἐὰν μὴ ἐν ἐμοὶ μένητε.

xiv. 7. καὶ τὰ ἡμικατά μον ἐν ύμῖν μείνηρ.

vi. 56. ἐν ἐμοὶ μένει κάγω ἐν αὐτῇ (cf. xiv. 10).
With regard to the use of ἐκεῖνος of Christ, Holtzmann quotes Jn. i. 8, which is obviously a mistake. The last passage from the Gospel, not quoted by Holtzmann, is the only exact parallel, if it is to be interpreted in this sense, to the usage of the Epistle. In all the other instances there is some sort of antecedent which determines the meaning of ἐκεῖνος. But, at any rate, it is possible to see in the Gospel, if it is earlier than the Epistle, a growing tendency to use ἐκεῖνος of Christ, almost as a proper name, a use which has become fixed in the Epistle.

The attempt has been made to show how each phrase is used in the Gospel and the Epistle. The connection is obvious. In explaining it the choice has to be made between an imitator and a writer repeating, not without significant variations, his common phrases and methods of expression. The usage of these phrases seems on the whole to support the latter hypothesis. But the question can only be determined after considering the other evidence.

It will be noticed that in the phrases quoted above the similarity is not confined to actual phrases used, but extends to common types, in which the same outline is variously filled up. Other, and perhaps clearer, instances of this have been noticed. Compare 1 Jn. v. 10 with Jn. iii. 18 (the upper line gives the words of the Epistle, the lower of the Gospel)

> μη πιστευων τω θεω ψευδην πεποιηκεν αυτων οτι ου πεπιστευκεν εις την μαρθηνη κεκριται τυριαν ἦν μειαρτηρηκεν ὁ θεος περι του νιου αυτου τω ονομα του μονογενους > ἄν ΄. ΤΩΕΜΛΟΤΕΚΕΥ εἰς ΚΕΚΠΛΤΓΛ 1, Α, < Α Ν ~ > α τυρίαν ἣν μεμαρτύρηκεν ὃ θεὸς περὶ τοῦ αὐτοῦ

> Λα ἀρ εν! πτο τον τά ΛN. 1.2

> ΤΟ ὄνομα τοῦ μονογενοῦς τοῦ θεοῦ: (ἡ ζωὴ) ἥτις ἀρ εν πατέρα πῆς > with Jn. i. 1, (ἡ ζωη) ἦτως ἦν προς τον πατέρα ἡ ζωὴ) > to του κόσμου εἰσών. διὰ τοῦτο ἐκ του κόσμου ὃ ων ἐκ τῆς γῆς η τῆς γῆς εστίν καὶ τῆς γῆς λαλοῦσιν λαλεῖ; I Jn. iv. 13 with Jn. v. 56, ἐν αὐτῷ μένουμεν καὶ αὐτὸς ἐν ἡμῖν, ἐν ἐμοὶ μένει κάγω ἐν αὐτῷ; I Jn. v. 4 with Jn. iii. 6, ῥ γεγεννημένον εκ του θεου πνεύματος; I Jn. iii. 15 with Jn. v. 38, οὐκ ἔχει ζωῆν αἰώνιον εν αὐτῷ μένουσαν, τον λόγον αὐτοῦ οὐκ ἔχετε ἐν ὑμῖν μένοντα; I Jn. ii. 21 with Jn. viii. 32, ὁδιάτε τῆν ἀλήθειαν. It would be easy to make the list a long one. But these examples serve as illustrations. Again, the usage suggests a writer who varies his own phrases, rather than a mere copyist. If it is a question of copying, there has at least been intelligent use and not slavish imitation.

The following points of similarity of style have often been noticed:

1. The infrequent use of the relative. The thought is carried on by means of
   (a) οὐ . . . ἀλλὰ. This use is very frequent. Cf. Jn. i. 8, 13; Jn. ii. 2, 16, 21.
Disconnected sentences. Cf. 1 Jn. i. 8 (ἐὰν εἴπωμεν), 9 (ἐὰν ὁμολογῶμεν), 10 (ἐὰν εἴπωμεν); Jn. iii. 18, ὁ πιστεύων ... ὁ μὴ πιστεύων.

Frequent in Gospel and Epistle.

Positive and negative expression of a thought.

Cf. 1 Jn. i. 5, ὁ θεὸς φῶς ἐστὶν καὶ σκοτία οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν αὐτῷ οὐδεμία: Jn. i. 3, πάντα δὲ αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο καὶ χωρὶς αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο οὐδὲ ἐν.

The emphasizing of a thought by introducing it with a demonstrative, ἐν τούτῳ, αὕτη, etc., followed by an explanatory clause introduced by ἵνα, ἐὰν, or ὅτι, or by a clause added in apposition.

In most of these instances the reference of ἐν τούτῳ, etc., to what follows is undoubted, though some of them are often, if not usually, interpreted otherwise. Again, the impression left by studying them is not that of slavish copying.

Several other small points may also be noticed:

The use of πᾶς ὁ with a participle: cf. 1 Jn. iii. 4, πᾶς ὁ ποιῶν: Jn. iii. 16, πᾶς ὁ πιστεύων. Frequent in both writings.
THE EPISTLES AND THE GOSPEL

§ 1.

Cf. I Jn. v. 4, πάν τὸ γεγεννημένον ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ νικᾷ: Jn. vi. 37, πάν ὁ διδωσίν μοι . . . πρὸς με ἥξει.
The repetition of emphatic words, especially κόσμος, θεός, πνεῦμα.
The frequent use of καὶ . . . δέ: cf. I Jn. i. 3, καὶ ἡ κοινωνία δὲ ἡ ἡμετέρα: Jn. vi. 51, καὶ ὁ ἀρτὸς δέ.
The elliptic use of ἀλλ᾽ ἵνα: cf. I Jn. ii. 19, ἀλλ᾽ ἵνα φανερωθῶσιν ὅτι οὐκ εἰσίν πάντες: ἔξ ἡμῶν: Jn. ix. 3, ἀλλ᾽ ἵνα φανερωθῇ τὰ ἐργα τοῦ θεοῦ: Jn. i. 8, ἀλλ᾽ ἵνα μαρτυρήσῃ περὶ τοῦ φωτός.
The use of καθὼς . . . καί: cf. I Jn. ii. 18, καθὼς ἥκουσατε . . . καί νῦν . . . γεγόνασιν: Jn. xiii. 15, ἰνα καθὼς ἐγώ ἐποίησα . . . καί ὑμεῖς ποιήτε.
The elliptic use of οὐ καθὼς: cf. I Jn. iii. 11, 12, ἀγαπῶμεν ἀλλήλους: οὐ καθὼς Καίν ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ ἦν: Jn. vi. 58, οὕτως ἔτοιμ ὁ ἀρτὸς ὁ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ καταβάς, οὐ καθὼς ἔφαγον οἱ πατέρες καὶ ἀπέθανον.
Some of these are worth noticing in view of the assertion that the similarities of style and expression are mostly in the case of obvious points, which are easily imitated.

(4) Attention must also be drawn to the limited vocabulary of both writings, and the very small number of ἀπαξ λεγόμενα (i.e. words not found elsewhere in the New Testament) which they contain in common. Of words common to both writings but not found elsewhere in the New Testament we have only ἀνθρωπόκτονος and παράκλητος. The First Epistle gives us four ἀπαξ λεγόμενα (ἀγγελία, ἱλασμός, νίκη, χρίσμα). If the three Epistles are taken together the list is increased by the following words, ἀντίχριστος, ἐπιδέχομαι, κυρία, φιλοπρωτεύω, προσπάθεια, πρωτεύω, χάρτης. The number in the Gospel is far larger, and does not offer any striking contrast to the other Books of the N.T. But its longer list, as compared with the Epistles, is adequately explained by the character of the words which it contains.

The importance of N.T. ἀπαξ λεγόμενα has naturally decreased in consequence of the discoveries of Papyri in the last quarter of a century, which have taught us the danger of treating N.T. Greek as an isolated phenomenon, even if the actual words in question are not among those of which our knowledge has been substantially increased by better acquaintance with vulgar Greek. It may also be doubted whether the author's vocabulary is really so limited as the perusal of his writings at first suggests. He can say most of what he has to say by the careful use of a few words, and prefers to vary his forms of expression rather than his vocabulary. He has no love for synonyms which have no difference in meaning. He does not care to show his command of language by the use of many σημαίνοντα to express the same σημαινόμενον. He is altogether free from the artificialities of the later literary κοινή. He does not, however seem to be at loss for a word to express his meaning. But however this may be, the limited range of normal vocabulary is a feature common to both writings.

The similarity is not confined to style and vocabulary, extends to ideas, both as regards doctrine and ethics.

(1) The general ideas which form the basis of the Johannine teaching are common to both.

The incarnation of the Son of God:

1 Jn. iv. 2. ᾿Ιησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα.
Jn. i. 14. ὁ λόγος σάρξ ἐγένετο.

The life which has its source in Him:

1 Jn. v. 11. αὐτῇ ἡ ζωὴ ἐν τῷ νῦν αὐτῶν ἔστιν.
Jn. i. 4. (ὁ γέγονεν) ἐν αὐτῷ ζωὴ ἦν.
vi. 35. ὁ ἄρτος τῆς ζωῆς (cf. ver. 48).
vi. 33. ζωὴν δίδον τῷ κόσμῳ.

And which is identified with Him:

1 Jn. i. 1, 2. ὁ ᾿Ην ἀπε ᾿Αρχῆς ... περὶ τοῦ λόγου τῆς ζωῆς ... καὶ ἡ ζωή ἐφανερώθη.

Jn. v. 26. οὕτως καὶ τῷ νῦν ἐδωκεν ζωὴν ἐξειν ἐν αὐτῷ.

xi. 25. ἐγὼ ἐίμι ... ἡ ζωή.

(In 1 Jn. v. 20, οὕτως ἐστιν ὁ ἀληθινός θεὸς καὶ ζωὴ αἰώνιος probably refers to the Father, the God who has been made known by Jesus Christ; cf. Jn. v. 26a.)

Abiding in God: being in Christ, the means of abiding in God:

1 Jn. ii. 24. ἐν τῷ νῦν καὶ ἐν τῷ πατρὶ μενεῖτε.

iii. 6. τὰς ὅ ἐν αὐτῷ μένων.

Jn. vi. 56. ἐν ὑμῖν μένει κἀγὼ ἐν αὐτῷ.

xiv. 4-7. (ὁ μένων ἐν ὑμῖν κἀγὼ ἐν αὐτῷ).

1 Jn. v. 20. ἐσμεν ἐν τῷ πατρὶ καὶ ἐν αὐτῷ Ἰησοῦν Χριστῷ.

Jn. xiv. 20. ἐγὼ ἐν τῷ πατρὶ μου καὶ ὑμῖν ἐν ὑμῖν κἀγὼ ἐν ὑμῖν.

xvii. 21. Εἰνα καὶ αὐτοὶ ἐν ὑμῖν ὡσιν.
God's word abiding in us:

1 Jn. ii. 14. ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ ἐν ὑμῖν μένει.
ii. 24. ὁ θεὸς ἐν ὑμῖν μένει.
Jn. v. 38. τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ ὑμὶν ἐχέτε ἐν ὑμῖν μένοντα.

God's love proved by the sending of His Son:

1 Jn. iv. 9. ὃ ἠκούσατε ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ἐν ὑμῖν μενέτω.
Jn. iii. 16. οὕτως ἠγάπησεν ὁ θεὸς τὸν κόσμον ὥστε τὸν ὑιὸν τοῦ μονογενῆ ἐδωκεν.

The command to love the brethren, which is the result of this:

1 Jn. iii. 23. καὶ ἀγαπῶμεν ἀλλήλους καθὼς ἔδωκεν ἡμῖν (cf. iii. 11, 16, 18).
Jn. xiii. 34. ἵνα ἀγαπᾶτε ἀλλήλους καθὼς ἠγάπησα ἡμᾶς (cf. xv. 12, 17).

Believers the children of God:

1 Jn. v. 1. πᾶς ὁ πιστεύων ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ γεγέννηται.
Jn. i. 12, 13. ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς ἐξουσίαν τέκνα θεοῦ γενέσθαι, τοῖς πιστεύουσιν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ.

The great stress laid on "witness":

1 Jn. v. 6. τὸ πνεῦμα ἐστιν τὸ μαρτυριόν (cf. vv. 9–11).
Jn. v. 36, 37. ἐγὼ δὲ ἔχω τὴν μαρτυρίαν μείζων τοῦ Ιωάννου κ.τ.λ. Cf. viii. 17 f.

(2) Certain pairs of opposites common to both writings: Light and Darkness, Life and Death, Love and Hate, Truth and Falsehood, The Father and the World, To be of the World, To be not of the World, God and the Devil, The children of God and the children of the Devil, To know and not to know God, To have seen and not to have seen Him, To have life and not to have life.

It would be very easy to extend largely those lists of similarities between the two writings. Many more are noticed in the Commentary. To quote all that exist would involve printing practically the whole of the Epistle and a large part of the Gospel. Schulze's statement, quoted by Holtzmann (p. 134), can hardly be denied, "In the whole of the first Epistle there is hardly a single thought that is not found in the Gospel."

No one would dispute Holtzmann's judgment, that these similarities are closer than those which connect the Third Gospel and the Acts, "whose common authorship is undoubted." In the Pauline literature the case of Ephesians and Colossians is analogous. We ought perhaps to add that of (part of) the two Epistles to the Thessalonians. And it must be admitted that these analogies raise the question of imitation. The question may well be asked whether a writer of such undoubted power and originality as the author of the Fourth Gospel would be likely "only to copy himself." It is quite possible that a writer who had steeped himself in the thought of the Fourth Gospel might produce the First Epistle. And it is by no means impossible that we have a similar case, perhaps the work of the same imitator, in the twenty-first chapter of the Gospel.

The answer to the question may prove to be discoverable only in the light of the writer's circumstances. The author of the Epistle certainly does not aim at literary effect. The edification of his children in the faith is his sole purpose in writing. And he is intensely in earnest. He is convinced that he knows what truths will meet their needs. He is fully aware that he has nothing new to say. They must learn to use what they already possess, even that which they had been taught from the beginning, by himself or by another. These are circumstances under which repetition was almost inevitable, especially in the case of a man whose nature led him to ponder deeply over a few ideas rather than to produce new thoughts every day.

There is another point which must be considered in this connection. In what sense is the author of the Fourth Gospel original? Few would venture to deny the depth of thought and spiritual insight of the Fourth Gospel. How far is this due to the author's originality? How much has he learnt from others, or from Another? There will probably always be differences of opinion as to whether he is most indebted to S. Paul or to the Lord Himself. The Fourth Gospel has a large part to play in the controversy which rages round the question Jesus or Paul? But whether we accept or reject the paradox of Wernle, "It is S. Paul who is original, S. John is not," as a solution of the Johannine problem, we can hardly escape the impression which the study of the Fourth Gospel leaves with us, that its author meditates and transforms rather than originates. The process may have reached a further stage of development in the Epistle. We may be nearer to the writer's own thoughts, or rather the process of assimilation may be more complete, whereas in the Gospel we can trace more clearly his debt to another. But such a writer as the author of the Gospel might well "repeat himself," especially if he were fully conscious that he had already said or taught his readers all that they required to meet the circumstances in which they found themselves placed. "Ὅμοιος ὃ ἤκούσατε ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ἔν ὑμῖν μενέτω is the burden of his message. His chief object in writing is to remind them what it was.

It cannot, therefore, be said that the absence of new matter

1 If, for present purposes, we may so describe the man who has given it to us in its present form.
in the Epistle is necessarily suspicious. But this view would, of course, have to be modified if convincing evidence were forthcoming that the resemblance between the two writings is mainly confined to obvious points which could be easily caught and imitated, while there are real differences in minor points of style and expression where conscious imitation would be less easy, and where the peculiarities of the imitator would be most likely to show themselves. The following points are cited in support of such a hypothesis:

"Εχειν ἐλπίδα ἐπί τινι. This is said to be "contrary to the general usage of the N.T. (Ro. xv. 12 being a quotation from the O.T.), and also to that of Jn. v. 45 (ἐλπίζειν εἰς τινα)." The "usage of the N.T." is surely rather difficult to decide. As to ἐχειν ἐλπίδα we have Ac. xxiv. 15, ἐλπίδα ἐξων εἰς τὸν θεόν, and the passage in question from the Epistle with ἐπι. As to ἐλπίζειν we find εἰς οὐ, Jn. v. 45; ἐπὶ αὐτῷ, Ro. xv. 12 (= Is. xi. 10); ἐν Χριστῷ, 1 Co. xv. 10; ἐπὶ θεῷ, 1 Ti. iv. 10, vi. 17; ἐπὶ τὸν θεόν, 1 Ti. v. 5; ἐπὶ πλούτου ἀδηλότητι, 2 Ti. vi. 17; ἐπὶ θν... χάριν, 1 P. i. 13; εἰς θεόν, 1 P. iii. 5. It is unnecessary to illustrate or quote its use with the accusative, or ὅτι, or the infinitive, or its use absolutely. The evidence is clearly insufficient to establish a N.T. use for or against any particular construction.

We must next consider the use of ἀπό with the verbs ἀκούειν, αἰτεῖν, λαμβάνειν (cf. also ἔχειν, ii. 20, iv. 21), as against the usual construction with παρά which is found in the Gospel. With regard to ἀκούειν the usage is clear, so far as it goes, though it may be noticed that ἀκούειν ἀπό occurs only once in the Epistle, where it probably has a slightly different shade of meaning, emphasizing the ultimate rather than the immediate source of the hearing, that both constructions, ἀπό and παρά, are found in Acts (ix. 13, x. 22), and that Gospel and Epistle share the commoner construction, i.e., with a genitive of the person. Λαμβάνειν occurs twice, αἰτεῖν once in the Epistle, with the construction ἀπό τινος. In the Gospel λαμβάνειν παρά is found four times, αἰτεῖν παρά once. There is not very much ground here for a theory of separate authorship.

The following differences are also noticed, which for convenience may be tabulated:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>EPISTLE</th>
<th>GOSPEL</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>κοινωνία.</td>
<td>The Holy Spirit.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἔχειν τὸν υἱὸν.</td>
<td>Birth from above.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀγάπη τετελειωμένη.</td>
<td>θεὸς πνεύμα.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>θεὸς ἀγάπη.</td>
<td>ἀγάπην δίδωναι.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀγάπην ἀγάπαν.</td>
<td>ἐγνώκαμεν καὶ πεπιστεύκαμεν.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>πεπιστεύκαμεν καὶ ἐγνώκαμεν.</td>
<td>ποιεῖν τὴν ἀληθείαν.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ποιεῖν τὴν δικαιοσύνην.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
So far the list is perhaps more striking for its resemblances than its differences. There are, however, undoubtedly many words and phrases which are peculiar to each. Some of them remind us that the vocabulary of the author or authors is not quite so limited as is generally assumed. In any case, can we say that the peculiarities are greater than can be naturally explained by differences of time, circumstances, and subject?

The Index has been arranged so as to give with rough accuracy the full facts of vocabulary. It will be sufficient here to notice the differences to which Holtzmann has called attention.

The following words are quoted from the Gospel which are absent from the Epistle: δόξα, δοξάζειν, χάρις, πλήρωμα, οὐρανός, ἀνιστάνειν, ἀναστῆναι, ἀνάστασις, ἐγείρειν, οἱ νεκροὶ, ἀνωθεν, βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ, τὰ ἐπίγεια (ἐπουράνια), ύψοσθαι, ἀπολλύναι, σώζειν, ἐργάζεσθαι (used in the shorter Epp.), σωτηρία, δὲ πέμψεις, κρίμα, διακονεῖν, διάκονος, ἐμφανίζειν, εἰρήνη. Of these words some are so rare, comparatively or absolutely, that their absence in the Epistle would be more probable than their presence. There are not many which we should even expect to find, though the absence of δόξα, δὲ πέμψεις, κρίμα, ἀνωθεν calls for notice. There is perhaps not one of which we can say that the author of the Gospel must have used it if the Epistle were his.

The list of phrases is larger. A few facts as to usage, which go far to modify the significance of the list, have been noted in brackets: τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον (once in Gospel, cf. also xx. 22, πνεῦμα ἅγιον, whereas τὸ πνεῦμα is the common usage in both), γεννηθῆναι ἐκ πνεύματος, εἰς θάνατο καὶ πνεύματος (confined to the conversation with Nicodemus, while γεννηθῆναι ἐκ θεοῦ is common to both writings), ἀγαπᾶν τὸ φῶς, τὸ σκότος (once in Gospel), φάνα τράβοσεν (twice), μαρτυρία, of God (? cf. 1 Jn. v. 9, 10, ὃ κύριον, of Christ (six times, of which three are in ch. xxi.; xiii. 14, 16 have not been included), ἦ ὄργη τοῦ θεοῦ (once, cf. Ἀρ. ἐν τῷ θεῷ), ἵδεν ὥσπερ (once), προσκυνεῖν ἐν πνεύματι καὶ ἀληθείᾳ (twice, in ch. iv.), τιμᾶν τὸν πατέρα, υἱὸν (thrice in one verse, besides which only viii. 49, τιμῶ τὸν πατέρα μου, cf. xii. 26, τιμήσει αὐτὸν ὃ πατήρ, ποιεῖν τὰ ἀγαθά (once), ἀναστάσις, κρίσις (once each), μαρτυρεῖν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ (twice, cf. 1 Jn. v. 6, καὶ τὸ πνεῦμα ἐστὶ τὸ μαρτυροῦν, ὃ τὸ πνεῦμα ἐστὶν ἡ ἀλήθεια, ἐραυνάν τὰς γραφάς (once), οὐκ ἀποθνησκεῖν (twice, in ch. xxi., but cf. μή, οὐ μή twice or thrice) ἀποθνησκεῖν ἐν τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ (thrice, in one context), ρήματα τοῦ θεοῦ, ζωῆς αἰωνίου (twice and once), φῶς τοῦ κόσμου, τῆς ζωῆς (thrice and once), ἰδεῖν καταφανείτας (once), θεωρεῖν θάνατον, γεύεσθαι θανάτου (once each), μένειν ἐν τῷ λόγῳ (once), μένειν ἐν τῇ διδαχῇ: the corresponding ὁ λόγος . . . μένει . . . ἐν is common to Gospel and Epistle), ὁ λόγος χωρεῖ (once), ἐλευθεροῦν (twice); and ἐλευθεροῦν γενέσθαι (once, in same context), θεωρεῖν θανάτου, γενέσθαι θανάτου (once each), ὁ δαχων του κόσμου (once, τοις τωι twicex), νιο του φωτός (once), ο νιος ἐν τω πατρι (?), ο πατηρ ἐν τω νιο (once, ο πατηρ ἐν ροι, etc., fairly common), φιλευν, μυσει την ψυχην (once each), εχει ειρηνην (once), εχει το φως (twice), πιετεεν εις το φως (once), ηομαιζεν τοπον (twicex, in same context), ιτετει συ τα ονοματι (Χριστου) (five times, cf. 1 Jn. v. 14, κατα τα θελημα, μονην ποιειν παρα τιν (once), καρπον φερειν (eight times, of which six are in xv. 2–8), φανερουν το ονομα (once, the use of φανερουν is characteristic of both), εν ειτε (four times). If this list is at all complete, or representative, it certainly affords very little evidence of the presence in the Gospel of characteristic phrases not to be found in the Epistle. It consists mostly of phrases which are found only once or twice, or which, if they occur more frequently, are generally confined to a special context. There are very few of them of which we can say that their absence from the Epistle is significant.
THE EPISTLES AND THE GOSPEL

It may be worth while to go through in the same way the fifty "peculiarities" which Holtzmann has noted for the Epistle.

1) δ with the Present Participle. (Found eight times in Jn. xiii.–xvi., but certainly more frequent in the Epistle.)

2) έαν ειπωμεν δτι, περιπατωμεν, ημολογουμεν (εαν with each of these verbs occurs in the Gospel, and the use of εαν is fairly frequent in both writings; naturally opportunities for the use of the 1st person plural are far less in the Gospel than in the Epistle).

3) έκ τινος γινωσκειν (twicex). Cf. 1 Jn. ii. 18 (οθεν).

4) ίμεςι followed by a relative sentence, which becomes the subject of the main sentence (ιμεις δ ηκουσατε . . . εν ιμων μενετω, ii. 24, cf. 27). (May we not compare Jn. x. 29, δ πατηρ μου δ δεωκεν μοι παντων μειζον εστιν ?)

5) κοινωνια, with God, Christ, the brethren. (The teaching about κοινωνια in the Epistle is surely the natural sequel of Jn. xiv.–xvii.)

6) αγγελια, επαγγελια, επαγγελλειν. (It may be noted that αγγελλειν is a N.T. hapax legomenon in the Gospel.)

7) εαυτον πλαναν. (The verb is common to both.)

8) ημολογειν τας αμαρτιας. (The verb is, of course, common to both. Its use with αμαρτια is peculiar, in the N.T., to the one passage 1 Jn. i. 9; cf. έξομολογεισθαι, Mt., Mk., Ja.)

9) πιστος, of God. (Once. The word is used once in the Gospel.)

10) η αγαπη τετελεισται. (Cf. Jn. xvii. 23, ηνω ωσιν τετελειωμενον εις εν . . . και ηγαπησας αυτους καθως εμε ηγαπησας.)
\(\textbf{xiV} \) THE EPISTLES OF S. JOHN

\((11)\) διάνοια \(\text{(once)}\).

\((12)\) παράγειν. (More correctly παράγεσθαι. The active παράγειν occurs twice in the Gospel, in a different sense.)

\((13)\) ἀγαπᾶν τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς. (The phrase of the Gospel, ἵνα ἀγαπᾶτε ἀλλήλους, quoted as a contrast, is perhaps a sufficient parallel.)

\((14)\) σκάνδαλον, ii. 10 (cf., however, with the context, ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ περιπατεῖ οὐκ οἶδεν ποῦ ὑπάγει: Jn. xi. 9, ἐὰν τις περιπατήῃ ἐν τῇ ἡμερᾷ οὐ προσκόπτει.)

\((15)\) ἀφέωνται ὑμῖν αἱ ἁμαρτίαι διὰ τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ. (Cf. Jn. xx. 23, ἂν τινω ἄφητε τὰς ἁμαρτίας ἀφέωνται αὐτοῖς.)

\((16)\) παρουσία (once).

\((17)\) ἀγαπᾶν τὸν κόσμον. (Should we compare Jn. xxii. 15, ἀγαπᾶς μὲ πλέον τούτων? At any rate the resemblance of the two writings in their use of κόσμος is far more striking than the absence of a particular phrase from one of them.)

\((18)\) ἁγνός. (Once.)

\((19)\) ἵστρος (once).

\((20)\) ἀφέωνται ὑμῖν αἱ ἁμαρτίαι διὰ τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ. (Cf. Jn. xx. 23, ἂν τινω ἄφητε τὰς ἁμαρτίας ἀφέωνται αὐτοῖς.)

\((21)\) τὸ χρίσμα. (Thrice; cf. Jn. iii. 34, δίδωσιν τὸ πνεῦμα: cf. vii. 39.)

\((22)\) ἀφετεροῦντο, ὁμολογοῦν, τὸν νιόν. (Cf., however, Jn. i. 20, ὁμολογοῦντο καὶ οὐκ ἢρνηστό.)

\((23)\) ἐκχεῖν τὸν πατέρα, τὸν νιόν. (Cf., perhaps, Jn. iii. 29, ἐκχεῖν τὴν νύμφην.)

\((24)\) παρρησία πρὸς τὸν θεόν. (The word is fairly common in the Gospel.)

\((25)\) ἀφετεροῦντο, ὁμολογοῦν, τὸν νιόν. (Cf., however, Jn. i. 20, ὁμολογοῦντο καὶ οὐκ ἢρνηστό.)

\((26)\) ἀφετεροῦντο, ὁμολογοῦν, τὸν νιόν. (Cf., however, Jn. i. 20, ὁμολογοῦντο καὶ οὐκ ἢρνηστό.)

\((27)\) ἀφετεροῦντο, ὁμολογοῦν, τὸν νιόν. (Cf., however, Jn. i. 20, ὁμολογοῦντο καὶ οὐκ ἢρνηστό.)

\((28)\) ἀφετεροῦντο, ὁμολογοῦν, τὸν νιόν. (Cf., however, Jn. i. 20, ὁμολογοῦντο καὶ οὐκ ἢρνηστό.)

\((29)\) ἀφετεροῦντο, ὁμολογοῦν, τὸν νιόν. (Cf., however, Jn. i. 20, ὁμολογοῦντο καὶ οὐκ ἢρνηστό.)

\((30)\) ἀφετεροῖς. (Once. The word does not occur in any of the Gospels. Cf., however, Jn. v. 45, εἰς ἐν ἡλπίκατε, with the passage in the Epistle, iii. 3, ἐκχεῖν τὴν ἐλπίδα ταύτην ἐπὶ αὐτοῦ.)

\((31)\) ἀγνός. (Once. But ἁγνῖζεω, which occurs in the same verse, is common to both.)

\((32)\) ἅγνός. (Twice. In the same context.)
§ 1.

THE EPISTLES AND THE GOSPEL

(33) ἐφανερώθη ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ. (Cf. Jn. i. 31, ἀλλ᾽ ἵνα φανερωθῇ τῷ Ἰσραήλ.)

(34) λυεῖν τὰ ἔργα τοῦ διαβόλου. (Cf. Jn. vii. 23, ἵνα μὴ λυθῇ ὁ νόμος: viii. 41, τὰ ἔργα τοῦ πατρὸς ὑμῶν.)

(35) τὸ σπέρμα τοῦ θεοῦ, ὃ γεννήσας (of God). (Cf. Jn. i. 13, ἐκ θεοῦ ἐγεννηθῆσαν: viii. 33, σπέρμα Αβρααίμ.)

(36) ἐν τούτῳ φανερά ἐστίν. (Φανεροῦν is characteristic of both writings.)

(37) καταγινώσκειν. (Twice. Elsewhere only in Gal. ii. 11.)

(38) ὁ ἐν υἱῶ, ὃ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ. (The contrast is characteristically Johannine, though the actual phrases do not occur in the Gospel.)

(39) μένει ἐν τῷ θανάτῳ: (A phrase cast in a thoroughly Johannine mould. Cf. also Jn. iii. 36, ὁ δὲ ἀπεθανὼν τὸ υἱός οὐκ ὄψεται ζωήν, ἀλλ᾽ η ὀργή του θεοῦ μένει ἐπ᾽ αὐτῶν.)

(40) πιστεύειν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ υἱοῦ. (We complete the phrase, αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, we may compare Jn. xvi. 1, ὁ δὲ ἀπειθῶν τοῦ θεοῦ μένει ἐν τῷ θανάτῳ αὐτοῦ.)

(41) τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς πλάνης. (Cf. τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας, which is common to both. The one phrase suggests the other.)

(42) δοκιμάζειν τὰ πνεύματα (once).

(43) κλείειν τὰ σπλάγχνα. (The verb is common to both.)

(44) πείθειν τὰς καρδίας ἡμῶν. (Cf., perhaps, μὴ ταρασσέσθω ὑμῶν ἡ καρδιά.)

(45) ἁμαρτία πρὸς θάνατον. (Cf. Jn. ix. 41, ἡ ἁμαρτία ὑμῶν μένει: viii. 24, ἀποθανεῖσθε ἐν ταῖς ἁμαρτίαις υμῶν.)

(46) τηρεῖν έαυτὸν, έαυτὸν φυλάσσειν. (The former is probably not the true text, αὐτόν having better support. With τηρεῖ αὐτόν, cf. Jn. xvii. 12, ἐγὼ ἐτήρουν αὐτοὺς ἐν τῷ ὄνοματι μου. For φυλάσσειν cf. xvii. 12, καὶ ἐφύλαξα.)

(47) ὁ κόσμος ὅλος ἐν τῷ πονηρῷ κεῖται. (Cf. Jn. xvii. 15, ἵνα τηρήσῃς αὐτοὺς ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ.)

(48) φόβος, as the opposite of ἀγάπη, the Gospel having only φόβος τῶν ἱονδῶν. Perhaps it is no altogether fanciful to see some recollection of the fear which kept men from open confession, in the love issuing in confidence, which "casts out fear."

(49) ἔχειν τὴν μαρτυρίαν ἐν εαυτῷ. (Perhaps we may compare Jn. iii. 33, ὁ λαβὼν αὐτοῦ τὴν μαρτυρίαν ἐσφράγισεν).

(50) κόλασις (once).

Thus on closer inspection a considerable number of the phrases which are actually peculiar to the Epistle remind us so strongly of similar phrases and thoughts in the Gospel that it is again the resemblance rather than the difference that is brought into prominence. The phenomena are not inconsistent with the theory of imitation, but they do not find their most natural explanation in it. The variations in phrase suggest common authorship rather than servile, or even intelligent, copying. Both writings show the same characteristics, a small vocabulary used and used up; reiteration with slight variations, generally conveying some correspondingly slight difference of meaning; and no more new words than the differences of subject and circumstance call for, and are amply sufficient to explain.

Is there any difference in the ideas and conceptions expressed in this similar but not identical phraseology, sufficiently marked to compel us to assume a corresponding difference in authorship?

Such a difference can hardly be found in the λόγος of the Gospel Prologue as compared with the vaguer λόγος τῆς ζωῆς of the Epistle. No doubt the one phrase describes a difference of Person, while the other is impersonal. But the personal distinction of ὁ λόγος and πατὴρ is as clearly marked in the Epistle as in the Gospel. It is possible that the more definite λόγος has been avoided in agreement with the growing Monarchian tendencies of a later stage of doctrine, but the pre-existent personality of Him who “came in flesh” is as definitely taught in the Epistle as in the Gospel.

In the Epistle the sum of the ἀγγελία which the writer has to announce is said to be that God is light. In the Gospel, light is used as a description of the pre-existent and the Incarnate Logos. And in general it has been maintained that the Christ of the Epistle is more definitely separated from God and brought nearer to the believing Christian. The Christ of the Epistle is only Prophet, Example, Advocate, Reconciler. He is separated from us by sinlessness rather than by Divinity.

It is probably true that in the Gospel Christ is always represented as the connecting point between God and the world. As God is to Christ, so is Christ to “His own,” whereas in the Epistle this relation is “simplified.” Commentators are divided as to whether this is brought about by setting God on the one side, Christ and His own on the other, or whether the Epistle goes further than the Gospel in the direction of glorifying the Christ. The number of passages in the Epistle in which it is extremely difficult to decide whether God or Christ is the subject, certainly point in the latter direction. But it is doubtful whether the differences between Gospel and Epistle are as great as is assumed by those who maintain the theory of different authorship. In the Gospel it is natural that the relation of Christ to God on the one hand, and to His followers on the other, should be dwelt upon; while in the Epistle the relation of the Brethren to the Father should be more prominent. But this relationship is always conceived of as realized in and through Christ. “Our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ.” We may compare Jn. xvi. 27, “the Father Himself loveth you”; “I do not say that I will ask the Father concerning you.” The difference exists, but it is a difference of standpoint and of expression, not a fundamental difference of conception. And it is a difference specially noticeable in certain forms of expression which are used, rather than in the general teaching of the Epistle as a whole. The Gospel taught who and what the Christ is. The Epistle is written to assure those who had learned its lesson that, if they will but remember it, they can feel sure confidence as to the relationship in which they stand to God in His Son Jesus Christ. The differences correspond to the different objects of the two writings.

If this view of the general teaching of the two writings is correct, it will explain the similar phenomena which are traceable with regard to the ideas of life and love. In the Gospel it is Christ who came that they might have life—in the Epistle we read ζωὴν αἰώνιον ἐδωκεν ἡμῖν ὃ θεός: but the author hastens to add, “this life is in His Son.” So with love. In the Gospel “the love wherewith God loves the faithful is always grounded in the love wherewith He loves the Son.” They must abide in the Son’s love, as He abides in the love of the Father. In 1 Jn. iv. 9–11 the stress is laid on the love of God for the world and for us. But the intimate connection of this passage with Jn. iii. 16 certainly suggests that the writer of the Epistle is conscious of no fundamental difference of view. Again, in the Gospel it is the Logos who gives power τέκνα θεοῦ— in the Epistle it is “a direct proof of the love of the Father ἵνα τέκνα θεοῦ κληθῶμεν, καὶ ἐσμέν.” But in all these points it is hardly too much to say that a real difference can be established only by ignoring the expressions and thoughts in either document which tell the other way. It may also be true that in the Gospel the unity of the Son with the Father is the type of the union of the faithful with the Son, and therein with the Father (cf. xiv. 20, xvii. 23); whereas the Epistle speaks more directly, “We are in God,” “God in us”; and the same difference can be traced in the use of μένειν. Christ’s command in the Gospel to exercise mutual love may be expressed in the Epistle as an ἐντολὴ τοῦ θεοῦ. But such differences are not mutually exclusive. To the mind of the writer or writers of Gospel and Epistle it is doubtful if they would present themselves as differences at all. The emphasis falls differently. But the final summary of the Epistle, if naturally interpreted, points to fundamental unity of conception. "We are in the true God, in His Son Jesus Christ." "This (the God revealed in Jesus Christ) is the true God and eternal life." The same is true of the conception of the death of Christ as propitiatory. Ἵλασμός occurs only in the Epistle. The idea is more prominent in the Epistle. It is not absent from the Gospel. It is to be found both in what the Evangelist puts into the mouth of others, and also in his own comments.

So, too, with the conception of the Parousia. In both we find the spiritual idea of an abiding presence, and the more popular conception of a day of judgment, a last day, a last hour. The difference is one of emphasis. In the Epistle, as well as in the Gospel, eternal life is a present possession, and also an object of promise. The many Antichrists and many false prophets of the Epistle are its peculiar form of expression, but there is room for them in the sufferings of the Disciples which are foreseen in Jn. xvi. 2–4, even if we refuse to see in the warning of the Gospel, "If another come in his own name, him ye will receive," a historical reference to Bar-Kochba. Popular conceptions may be more prominent in the Epistle, though we are not justified in ignoring the "spiritualizing" of the conception of Antichrist as fulfilled in many forms of anti-Christian teaching. But fundamental difference can be maintained only by ignoring parts of the evidence.

The differences of thought and expression make it probable that some interval of time should be placed between the composition of the two writings. In view of such differences it is difficult, if not impossible, to accept Lightfoot's view, that the Epistle was intended to serve as an Introduction to the Gospel written to accompany it.¹ The evidence does not justify the conclusion that they could not have been written at the same time by the same writer. It does, however, make such a view extremely improbable. On the other hand, it is not enough to compel us to assume different authors. In most cases of a similar kind, certainly in this particular instance, it is practically impossible to prove common authorship, as against imitation, or similarity produced by common education in the same school of thought. We are always on safer ground when we speak of the "Ephesian Canonical Writings" than when we assign them definitely to S. John, Apostle or Elder. But there are no adequate reasons for setting aside the traditional view which attributes the Epistle and Gospel to the same authorship. It remains the most probable explanation of the facts known to us.

¹ Unless, indeed, the Epistle was written to accompany its publication sometime after it was written.
The further conclusion that the theory of common authorship can be maintained only on the hypothesis that the Epistle is earlier than the Gospel, is still more precarious. It is really based on the assumption that one who had reached the heights of the Gospel could never have descended to the more commonplace conceptions of the Epistle. And this ignores the fact that whatever his own highest achievements may have been, the author is practically limited by the intelligence and spiritual capacity of his readers. The more the Epistle is read and studied, the more fixed becomes the impression that we have in it an attempt to make plainer, for practical purposes of spiritual and religious life, the profound teaching contained in the Gospel, which the author had tried to convey to his fellow-Christians in all his dealings with them, but which they had in large measure failed to make their own. The results of the Gospel, or of the teaching which it contained, had not realized his expectations. To use one of the expressions of that Gospel, its message οὐκ ἐχώρει among those with whom the author dwelt and for whom he worked. He had to descend to a lower plane. But the question of priority must be discussed more fully, and in a separate section.

(b) Priority.

The discussion of the identity of authorship has at least established clearly the close connection which exists between the Gospel and the Epistle. The view of the priority of either document can be reasonably held in conjunction with that of imitation or of identity of authorship, though Holtzmann regards the latter view as tenable only on the assumption that the Epistle represents an earlier stage in the development of the writer's theological position. At any rate the question can be discussed independently of that of authorship.

The priority of the Epistle has been maintained on the following grounds:
(1) The introductory verses (1-4), which show many points of close connection with the Prologue of the Gospel, are said to present an earlier stage of the Logos doctrine. It does not go beyond the "personification of abstract categories, ἀιώνιος, λόγος τῆς ζωῆς, and the concrete conception of the Personal Logos has not yet been reached. It is only in the Gospel that the Monarchianism, common to the Epistle and other second century writings, is met by a clear differentiation of the Person of the Father and the Son.

If our evidence were confined to the Prologue and the Introduction, this statement might be regarded as satisfactory so far as the facts of doctrine contained in the two are concerned. But what is perhaps true of the prefatory verses cannot be so clearly established for the whole of the Epistle as compared with the whole of the Gospel. There are many passages in the Epistle where the “personal differentiation” of the Father and the Son is presented as clearly as in the Logos doctrine of the Gospel (cf. ii. 22 f., iv. 2, v. 10, etc., even if we do not quote the third verse of the Epistle), though the relation of Christ to the Father is not so prominent a subject of teaching, or speculation, in the Epistle as in the Gospel, and the author’s insistence on the fact that the fellowship of Christians with God is realized in and through their union with Jesus Christ often makes it difficult to decide whether particular statements are meant to refer to Christ or to God. And even if this statement of the relations between the prologues is true, they lend themselves equally well to another explanation. It is at least as probable that in the Epistle there is a further accommodation to the Monarchian ideas which came into greater prominence as time went on. As Réville and others have shown, the doctrine of the Gospel was probably far in advance of the general Christian opinions and feeling of its date. Some accommodation to the average faith of Christendom would not have been unnatural.

And the general impression left by a comparison of the two passages is that the Preface to the Epistle presents a summary of the various points contained in the Prologue, and distributed throughout the Gospel, upon which the writer wishes to lay stress in the new circumstances that have arisen. Style and structure and vocabulary all point clearly to a close connection between the two. To those who had been taught on the lines of the Prologue to the Gospel the opening expressions of the Epistle would be intelligible and full of meaning. It is far more difficult to explain the Prologue as an expansion and development of what is contained in the Epistle.

(2) It has been thought that the ἄλλος παράκλητος of Jn. xiv. 16 was suggested by the doctrine of the Epistle, which presents Christ as the Paraclete (ii. 1). The two ideas are quite different, and neither of them excludes the other. In the Epistle, Christ’s advocacy is exercised in heaven. He pleads the cause of His followers with the Father, to whose presence His “righteousness” gives Him, so to speak, the right of entry. In the Gospel, the sphere of the Spirit’s advocacy is on earth, and is consequent on the withdrawal of the bodily presence of the Speaker. The “advocacy” consists in calling to the remembrance of the Disciples the real import of the Lord’s words, in convicting the “World” of the mistakes they have made with regard to the Christ, and in leading the Disciples into all the truth. A comparison of the use of παράκλητος in the Epistle with that found in the Gospel yields no indication as to which document is the earlier.

(3) Eschatological teaching. The writer of the Epistle, it is said, expects the Parousia in the immediate future. The last hour has struck. Antichrist is already at work, or at least the work of his subordinates proclaims his near approach. The Evangelist has given up this expectation. The "coming" has been refined into the symbolical expression of a spiritual presence. Here again it may be quite true that the Epistle represents average Christian feeling more closely than the Gospel. If it is so, modification of more original, and perhaps unpopular, views is quite as probable an explanation as growth out of the stage of ordinary Christian opinion. In reality, however, the difference between the two has been greatly exaggerated. Serious divergence can perhaps be maintained only by the convenient, but arbitrary, process of eliminating from the Gospel all the evidence which tells the other way. The language of Jn. v. 26–29, vi. 39, 40, shows that the Evangelist had not given up the popular expectation of a "last day" and a final judgment. There are many expressions in the farewell discourses which point in the same direction. And even if there is any real difference, it is not improbable that the events in which the writer of the Epistle saw the signs of the approach, or the actual advent, of Antichrist may have led to a nearer approach, at a later period, to the average Christian expectation, which at the time when the Gospel was written, though never actually repudiated, was less prominent in the writer's view. It should also be noticed that the "spiritualization" of the idea of Antichrist in the Epistle is at least as complete as the spiritualization of popular eschatology in the Gospel. The Parousia, which the writer of the Epistle expected, perhaps more eagerly than when he wrote the Gospel, was nevertheless a spiritual fact rather than an apocalyptic display.

(4) The Epistle is said to come nearer to the Pauline teaching than the Gospel, on the subject of propitiation. In i. 9, God's justice is put forward as the motive for the forgiveness of sins. Christ is spoken of as ἱλασμὸς περὶ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν: cf. Ro. iii. 25, ὃν προέθετο ὁ θεὸς ἱλαστήριον διὰ πίστεως ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἷματι. The Evangelist, it is said, conceives Christ's work from a wholly different standpoint,—the glorifying of the Father by the Son in making His name known among men (Jn. xvii. 4–8). Again it is a question of proportion rather than of fundamental difference. The expiatory character of Christ's work is not specially prominent in the Fourth Gospel, but it is clearly recognized, both in the saying ascribed to the Baptist, Ἰδοὺ ὁ
Some have found in the record of the piercing of the side (Jn. xix. 34 f.) a reminiscence of 1 Jn. v. 6, involving a misunderstanding of that passage. In the Epistle the “water” refers to the Baptism, and has nothing to do with the death of Jesus. It should not, it is said, have been introduced in that connection. Most scholars will agree with Holtzmann’s judgment, “nur schwer lässt sich das Missverständniss beweisen.” It would certainly be difficult to prove the misunderstanding. It may be added that the connection between the two passages is probably not so close as has often been supposed. The meaning of the “coming by water and blood” is discussed in the notes on the passage, and need not be considered at length here. It is far more probable that the incident, real or reputed, which the Evangelist records, suggested to the writer of the Epistle the significance of water and blood in the Messianic work of the Son of God. And this is true whatever relation we assume to exist between the Gospel and Epistle.

Some have detected an improvement in the Greek style in the Gospel as compared with the Epistle. The argument would no doubt appeal to those who have detected the difference. To the ordinary student it is certainly not obvious. It has, of course, no force or bearing on the question of priority for those who do not accept the common authorship of the two writings. And by those who do, Holtzmann’s judgment may again be quoted, “es giebt auch Rückschritte.”

Stress has also been laid on the fact, if it is a fact, that the Epistle was used by Papias and Polycarp at a time when certain traces of the Gospel are wanting. It may be sufficient to answer, with Holtzmann, that the Gospel was certainly known in Justin’s time, and it is not unnatural that the more popular writing which gave less offence to traditional Christian opinion should have become known first. The argument, however, such as it is, loses most of its force if we accept, with Bishop Lightfoot on the one hand, or Dr. Schwartz on the other, the more probable view that Papias knew and used the Fourth Gospel.

A considerable portion of the evidence which has been put forward in favour of the priority of the Gospel is as little conclusive as most of what has been considered on the other side. The following points need consideration:

Many passages in the Epistle seem to need the help of the Gospel in order to become intelligible. They could only have been addressed to those who knew the Gospel, or, at least, the teaching which it contains. The following passages are cited by Holtzmann:

ii. 2. καὶ αὐτὸς ἱλασμός ἐστιν περὶ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν, οὔτε περὶ τῶν ἡμετέρων δὲ ἀλλὰ καὶ περὶ ὅλου τοῦ κόσμου.

Jn. xi. 51 f. . . . ἐπροφήτευσεν ὅτι ἔμελλεν Ἰησοῦς ἀποθνῄσκειν ὑπὲρ τοῦ ἔθνους, καὶ οὐχ ὑπὲρ τοῦ ἔθνους μόνον, ἀλλὰ ὅνα καὶ τὰ τέκνα τοῦ θεοῦ τὰ διεσκορπισμένα συναγάγῃ εἰς ἐν. It is possible to see in the words of the Epistle, especially οὐ... ἀλλὰ περὶ ὅλου, an echo of the language, and still more of the thought, of the Gospel. But the instance does not carry us very far.

ii. 23. τὰς ὅ ὁ ἁρνούμενος τὸν ὅν ὅθε τὸν πατέρα ἔχει, ὁ ὁμολογῶν τὸν ὅν καὶ τὸν πατέρα ἔχει.

Jn. xv. 23 f. ὃ ἐμὲ μισῶν καὶ τὸν πατέρα μου μισεῖ... . . νῦν δὲ καὶ ἔναρκασιν καὶ μεμοντικασιν καὶ ἔμε καὶ τὸν πατέρα μου.

There is nothing here to determine the question of priority, though the similarity of thought is obvious.

ii. 27. καὶ οὐκ ἔχει τὸ χρίσμα ὃ ἐλάβετε αὐτοῦ μένει ἐν ἐμοί, καὶ οὐχ ἔχει τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ θεοῦ τὰ διεσκορπισμένα συναγάγει εἰς ἕν. It is possible to see in the words of the Epistle, especially οὐ... ἀλλὰ περὶ ὅλου, an echo of the language, and still more of the thought, of the Gospel. But the instance does not carry us very far.

Jn. xiv. 26. ὃ δὲ παράκλητος, τὸ πνεῦμα σα περὶ ἰγιο... . . εκεῖνος ὁμολογῶν τὸν υἱὸν καὶ τὸν πατέρα ἔχει. οὐ δὲ παράκλητος, τὸ πνεῦμα ὁ ὁμολογῶν τὸν υἱὸν καὶ τὸν πατέρα ἔχει. . .

Jn. xiv. 26. ὃ δὲ παράκλητος, τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ θεοῦ οὐδὲ τὸν πατέρα τοῦ θεοῦ ἔχει. . . ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ οὐκ ἔστηκεν.

Jn. xiv. 26. ὃ δὲ παράκλητος, τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ θεοῦ οὐδὲ τὸν πατέρα τοῦ θεοῦ ἔχει. . . ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ οὐκ ἔστηκεν.

Jn. xiv. 26. ὃ δὲ παράκλητος, τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ θεοῦ οὐδὲ τὸν πατέρα τοῦ θεοῦ ἔχει. . . ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ οὐκ ἔστηκεν.
be choosing from a larger store what he can most usefully apply to the circumstances with which he is dealing. He has but little, if anything, to add to what his readers have already been taught. Assume that they have been taught the content of the Gospel, and his language is nearly always seen to be intelligible and pertinent.

It must, of course, be remembered that, even if this is true, it does not amount to proof of the priority of the Gospel in actual composition. The author had, in all probability, taught its contents for some time before he committed them to writing. It may well have been that in the course of teaching they gradually took shape. Even if we need the Gospel to explain the Epistle, the readers of it may have had their necessary commentary in the author's oral teaching.

Attention has been called to the proportion of the closest parallels between Gospel and Epistle which are found in chs. xiii.-xvii. of the Gospel. The proportion is certainly large, if the length of these chapters be compared with that of the whole Gospel. The situation depicted in the last discourses, where the Christ gives His last instructions to the Disciples whom He is about to leave, naturally offers more points of contact with that of the Pastor committing, perhaps, his last words to writing for the sake of his "children," than the earlier chapters of the Gospel which show the Christ disputing with the Jews. The aim of the Epistle is far more to encourage and to build up than to warn and destroy, though the critical examination of its contents tends to bring the passages devoted to controversy into greater prominence than those which deal with edification. But the point has really no bearing on the question of priority.

The supposed direct references to the Gospel which are to be found in the Epistle must be considered next. It has been maintained that the ἀπαγγελία announced in the Epistle (i. 3, 5), that God is light and there is no darkness in Him at all, is not really carried out in the Epistle itself; and that the reference must therefore be to the Gospel. This is doubtful, especially in view of the identification of Christ with the "Light" in the Gospel as compared with the announcement of the Epistle that God is light. There is much about light and darkness in both, as Dionysius of Alexandria saw: but it can hardly be said that the announcement "God is light" is the message of the Gospel as a whole more than of the Epistle. And the idea which the phrase is introduced to emphasize, that fellowship with God is possible only for those who, so far as in them lies, strive to make themselves like Him, is one of the leading thoughts of the Epistle. It is true that the Epistle does not deal with the whole message about life, as detailed in the first verse, "that which was from the beginning, that which we have heard and seen," etc., and that in a sense the Gospel might be said to include it all.¹ But there is no necessary reference to the Gospel. The whole of the witness which their Christian teachers had borne to them, and the whole of the teaching which they had received from them, and especially from the writer of the Epistle, is a more natural explanation.

The other direct reference, as has been supposed, is found in ii. 14 (ἐγραφα ὑμῖν, παιδία κ.τ.λ.), where the triple ἐγραφα has been thought to refer to the Gospel. The change from present to aorist is difficult to explain. Perhaps no thoroughly satisfactory explanation can be offered. At first sight the reference to the Gospel is tempting. But the reference must have been made more explicit if it was to be intelligible, unless, indeed, the Epistle was written to accompany the Gospel, in which case the difference between γράφω and ἐγραφα has less point. And the reasons given for writing are not specially applicable to the Gospel, either in themselves or as distinguished from the almost identical reasons given for the three statements introduced by γράφω.

The theory that the Epistle was written as a Begleitungschrift, when the Gospel was published, deserves consideration. The case has been best stated by Ebrard, who tries to show that the false teaching of Cerinthus is really combated in the Gospel—written to prove the identity of Jesus with "the Christ, the Son of God" and God's agent in Creation, as contrasted with "an inferior power," ignorant of the Supreme God—as well as in the Epistle. The theory was held by Bishop Lightfoot, who refers to it three times in his lectures on S. John, but apparently never gave his reasons in full. It must stand or fall with the identity of aim and content of the two writings. The differences in vocabulary, style, and thought, which have been discussed in the previous section, lead to no definite conclusion. They merely make it difficult to suppose that the two writings are of exactly the same date.

The connection between the introductory verses and the Prologue of the Gospel has already been mentioned. If the whole is most easily explained as presupposing the Prologue, a closer examination of ver. 2 almost compels us to take this view.

¹ Perhaps the phrase καὶ ταῦτα γράφομεν of ver. 4 implies that vv. 1–3 contain something more than a summary of the contemplated letter.
There can be no doubt on which side the originality lies. The Epistle presents a summary, not a first sketch.

The exact interpretation of the ἐντολὴ καινὴ καὶ παλαιὰ of ii. 7, 8 is doubtful. But in the language used in these verses there is an almost certain reference to the “new commandment” of Jn. xiii. 34. Cf. especially 6 ἐστιν ἀληθὲς ἐν αὐτῷ καὶ ἐν ὑμῖν. The Lord had made a new commandment of the old legal precept, “Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.” It becomes new again in each Christian who fulfils it by obedience.

The expressions used in ii. 10 f., of love and light, hatred and darkness, appear to be a summary of the teaching contained in different passages of the Gospel (cf. xi. 9, 10, xii. 35 ff.).

The “promise which He promised, even eternal life” (ii. 25), is most naturally explained by reference to Jn. x. 28 (κἀγὼ δίδωμι αὐτοῖς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, καὶ οὐ μὴ ἀπολῶνται εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα). Should we also compare xiv. 19, ὅτι ἐγὼ ζῶ καὶ ὑμεῖς ζήσετε?

The section iii. 8–15, with its distinction of those who are born of God and those who are “of the Devil,” who sinneth from the beginning, and its denunciation of the murderous character of hatred, recalls the passage of the Gospel (viii. 40–44) where the Jews are proved to be “of the Devil” by the murderous hate with which they pursue the Lord, so closely that we are compelled to see dependence on its substance if not on its text. Again it is the Gospel that is “original,” though we may hesitate to follow Wellhausen in making use of the Epistle to rewrite the Gospel in its original form as presupposed by the Epistle (ὑμεῖς ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς τοῦ Καὶν ἔστε) in order to get a simpler explanation of ὁ πατὴρ αὐτοῦ in ver. 44. In the Epistle we find again the generalization of thoughts first struck out in the heat of controversy.

The “coming by water and blood” is not to be explained as a direct reference to the incident recorded in Jn. xix. 35. But it is almost certain that the record of that incident suggested to the writer of the Epistle the significance of “blood” and of “water” in the Messianic work of the Redeemer.

These instances could easily be multiplied, but they are representative. None of them amount to proof positive of the writer’s actual dependence on the text of the Gospel. But their evidence, such as it is, all points in the same direction. The Epistle presupposes in its readers acquaintance with "a compact body of teaching like that which we find in the Fourth Gospel," to use Dr. Sanday's phrase. And the general impression gained from studying the two writings is convincing. The impression left—the more clearly the longer the Epistle is studied—is that it was written to help and to warn those for whom the teaching of the Gospel, or "a body of teaching like" it, had not accomplished all that the writer had hoped. Throughout it is an appeal to the readers to use that which they already possess. It never should have been necessary, the writer seems to say, for him to write the Epistle. They needed no further instruction, if they would but make use of what had been theirs ἀπ᾿ ἀρχῆς. Their own experience should be able to do the rest. He writes to them not because they do not know, but because they know. They have received sufficient instruction and full illumination. They "all know." But knowledge has not been adequately translated into corresponding action and conduct. It has not been realized in life. And so there is doubt and hesitation in the face of new difficulties and changed circumstances. The whole aim of the Epistle is to recall to mind and to supplement what has long ago been fully given, but not adequately grasped. It is not the earnest of things to come. It owes its existence to the failure to make the most of the abundance that has been given. It is the aftermath, not the first-fruits, of the writer's message to the Church.

These considerations, if they accurately represent the facts, determine with certainty the question of priority, so far as the substantial content of the two documents is concerned. They do not perhaps preclude the possibility of a later date for the actual composition, or publication, of the Gospel. But in view of them such hypotheses are extremely unlikely.

§ 2. THE AIM.

The more definitely polemical aim of the Epistles is discussed in another section, where the passages which contain clear references to the tenets of the opponents are fully considered, as well as the extent to which the writer has them in view in other passages not so directly controversial in tone, and indeed throughout the Epistle. It is probably true that the writer never loses sight altogether of the views of his opponents in any part of the Epistle. But it is important to emphasize the fact that, in spite of this, the real aim of the Epistle is not exclusively, or even primarily, polemical. The edification of his “children” in the true faith and life of Christians is the writer’s chief purpose. The errors of the opponents do not constitute the only danger. The victory has been won, if only after a hard-fought battle, and the opponents, whose errors have been unmasked, “have gone out from among us,” or at least the leaders of the movement have withdrawn or been expelled. But there is still strong sympathy with their views, and perhaps acute danger of their return in power. The real danger is the attitude of the “children” themselves towards the Christian faith and life. The enthusiasm of the early days of the Faith is no longer theirs. Many of them had been brought up as Christians, and did not owe their faith to strong personal conviction or experience. Their Christianity had become largely traditional, half-hearted and nominal. They found the moral obligations of their religion oppressive. The “world” had great attractions for them. They wished to be on better terms with it than their Faith allowed. They were only too ready to welcome elements of religious and philosophical speculation foreign to the Faith and really destructive of it. They could not tolerate a sharp distinction between Christian and Unchristian in belief and practice. And therefore they were easily deceived by specious novelties. They had lost their instinctive feeling for what was of the essence of the Faith which they had received, or lay on the line of true development, and what was antagonistic to it. And another consequence of this “loss of their first love” was doubt and uncertainty as to their position as Christians. This is clearly seen if the verses introduced by ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκομεν or similar phrases are studied. Nine times at least the writer offers his readers tests by which they may assure themselves about the truth of their Christian position (ii. 3, ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκομεν ὅτι ἐγνώκαμεν αὐτόν: 5, ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκομεν ὅτι ἐν αὐτῷ ἐσμέν: iii. 16, ἐν τούτῳ ἐγνώκαμεν τὴν ἀγάπην: 19, ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκομεν ὅτι ἐγνώκαμεν τὴν ἀγάπην: 24, ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκομεν ὅτι ἐγνώκαμεν ἔσται ἐν ἦμῖν: iv. 2, ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκετε τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ θεοῦ: 6, ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκομεν τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀλήθειας: 13, ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκομεν ὅτι ἐγνώκαμεν ἐν αὐτῷ μένομεν: v. 2, ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκομεν ὅτι ἐγνώκαμεν ἐν τῷ θεῷ). The writer’s aim in this ninefold “hereby we know” cannot be only to set forth the true knowledge in opposition to the false “Gnosis” of his Gnostic opponents. Clearly his readers had felt the doubts which had grown in force in proportion as the enthusiasm of earlier days had waxed cold.

1 Recent Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, p. 245.

This view of the circumstances and condition of the Church or Churches addressed has been maintained by several writers, among whom Lücke and Rothe may be especially mentioned. It is presupposed in the words in which the author expresses the aim of his writing, before summing up the chief points of his message, ταῦτα ἔγραψα ὑμῖν ἵνα εἰδῆτε ὅτι ζωὴν ἔχετε αἰώνιον, τοῖς πιστεύουσιν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ νῦν τοῦ θεοῦ. Cf. also i. 4, ii. 1. Rothe’s words are worth quoting: “Der Apostel denkt sich also seine Leser als solche, in denen die ursprüngliche Klarheit des eigenthümlichen christlichen Bewusstseins verdunkelt, sein sicherer, scharf alles Unchristliche unterscheidender Tact abgestumpft, in denen die Frische des eigenthümlichen geistlichen Lebens ermattet, die Lauterkeit desselben verunreinigt ist.”

Huther’s rejection of this view on the ground of such passages as ii. 13, 14, 20, 21, 27, iii. 5, 14, iv. 4, 16, v. 18–20, meets with Holtzmann’s approval. The picture which they present of the readers’ state is too favourable to admit of such dark shortcomings. In reality it is just these passages which prove the point. The writer appeals to their privileged position and past victories. They are of those whose sins have been forgiven, who have known the Eternal, who have won the victory, in whom the Word of God abides. On these grounds he can appeal to them. But if they had been true to their privileges and their knowledge, it would not have been necessary to make the appeal. Those of whom ii. 13, 14 were true ought not to have needed the warning of ver. 15, Μὴ ἀγαπᾶτε τὸν κόσμον μηδὲ τὰ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ: They have the unction of the Spirit, knowledge is the possession of them all. He wrote to them not because of their ignorance, but their knowledge of the truth. They do not need teaching, if only they will use the powers which they possess (20, 21, 27). He would not write thus, unless they had in some measure failed to do their part. The extent of the failure must be measured by the gravity of the danger. They are of God, and have won a notable victory over the opponents (iv. 4). But they have to be reminded of the facts to urge them to the needed effort. The summary in v. 18–20 of what they know, and ought to use, has to be completed by the warning of ver. 21, φυλάξατε ἑαυτὰ ἀπὸ τῶν εἰδώλων.

Holtzmann has done good service towards the interpretation of the Epistle by showing how clearly Gnostic ideas are reflected throughout the Epistle. The writer always makes it his aim to set forth the true “knowledge” of Apostolic Christianity in its opposition to the false gnosis for which such great claims were made. And it is of primary importance to realize the undoubted polemical aim of much of its contents, and the modifications in his statement of what he believes to be positive truth, which are due to the fact that he never loses sight, in anything that he says, of the false teaching and unchristian conduct of his opponents. But it is at least as important to remember that his primary objects are to exhort and to edify. He is a pastor first, an orthodox theologian only afterwards. He cannot separate doctrine from ethics. But it is the life which he cares about. For him the Christian Faith is a life of fellowship "with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ." His first object in writing is to help his fellow-Christians to lead this life of fellowship, that his joy and theirs may be fulfilled. And no interpretation of the Epistle is likely to elucidate his meaning satisfactorily if it fails to realize where the writer's interest really lies. The nature and character of the false teaching denounced in the Epistle is a fascinating problem. But even a satisfactory solution of it would fail to provide an adequate explanation of the Epistle. Those methods of exegesis are unscientific which lay too exclusive stress on the doctrine which it teaches or the heresy which it seeks to refute. They tend to obscure rather than to elucidate the author's meaning. The polemical and controversial aims of the Epistle are considered at length elsewhere. Here it is only necessary to insist on the importance, for the right understanding of the Epistle, of fully recognizing the writer's other aims.

1 Rothe, Der erste Brief Johannis, p. 4.

§ 3. DESTINATION.

The general character of the Epistles, even of the First, show that they are almost certainly addressed to a definite Church, or group of Churches, the circumstances and difficulties of which were well known to the writer, or writers, of the Letters. The author of the First Epistle writes to Christians whom he knows, with whose needs he is fully acquainted, whom he has the right to help, and who acknowledge his right. The tekvia are not the whole body of Christians dispersed throughout the world. But we have nothing to help us in determining the destination of the Epistles beyond the universal tradition which connects them with Ephesus, or at least Asia Minor, the earliest traces of their appearance, and the undoubted connection of some of the Johannine literature with the Roman province of Asia.

In the "antiqua translatio" of Cassiodorus (Instit. Div. lit. 14) all three Epistles apparently bore the title "ad Parthos," and in his Complexiones (ll. 1370) the First Epistle is so designated. This attribution was not uncommon in the West. It is first found in Augustine, in the title of his ten Tractatus ("in 1 epistolam Ioannis ad Parthos”) and also in his Quaest. Ev. ii. 39. 1. Vigilius (? Idacius Clarus) in the Contra Varimadum introduces the gloss of the heavenly witnesses with the words “Item ipse ad Parthos.” The title found in a Genevan MS (Sabatier), “incipit epistola ad Sparthos,” suggests a Greek origin for the title (πρὸς πάρθους, the s of the preposition having been dittographed), or at least a Greek archetype for the title as it occurs in that MS. According to Bede the title was found in “many ecclesiastical writers,” including Athanasius. The title 'Ιωάννου ἐπιστολῆ β’ πρὸς πάρθους is found in the Greek minuscule, Oxford, Bodleian. Misc. 74 (Scr. 30, von Soden α111),2 and in the Florentine MS, Laur. iv. 32 (Scr. 89), both of the eleventh century. It appears also as colophon in a Paris MS of the fourteenth century (Reg. Gr. 6o, olim Colb.; Scr. 62).

1 Cf. Zahn, Forschungen, iii. 92, etc., from whom most of the information in this paragraph is taken.

The title would therefore appear to have originated in the East, from whence it may well have reached the West as early as the time of Athanasius. Various explanations of the title have been suggested. (1) It has been supposed to be a corruption of πρὸς παρθένους (cf. “Clement” quae ad uirgines scripta). Its reference to the First Epistle has been explained as the result of mistaking the title of the Second for the colophon of the First. (2) Zahn suggests that the real explanation is to be found in the next phrase of Clement’s Adumbrationes, “Scripta vero est ad quandam Babyloniam, electam nomine.” Clement takes the “Babylonian” lady for a real person, whose children are mentioned later in the Epistle. He cannot, therefore, have written πρὸς παρθένους, which must be a corruption of πρὸς πάρθους, which his translator read as παρθένους and translated accordingly. If a title corresponding to πρὸς Γαλάτας, ‘Εβραίους, and the like was to be found for the Babylonian lady and her children, πρὸς πάρθους would be the natural title to use in the time of Clement. There is no tradition of relations between S. John and Babylon or Parthians. The title must have been suggested by the name of the recipient, and not vice versa. Zahn further suggests that Clement must have identified the ἐκλεκτῇ κυρίᾳ of the Second Epistle with the η ἐν Βαβυλωνί συνεκλεκτῇ of 1 P v. 13. The difficulty raised by the passage in Eus. H. E. ii. 15, which apparently makes Clement interpret that phrase allegorically of Rome, Zahn meets by pointing out the uncertainty of how much of the Eusebian passage can be rightly referred to Clement. (Cf. ἤν καὶ συντάξεια φασίν ἐπ᾽ αὐτῆς Ρώμης.)

1 “Secundum sententiam hanc etiam illud est quod dictum est a Ioanne in epistola ad Parthos.”
Zahn's explanation of the origin of the title is certainly the most ingenious which has been suggested. It offers an adequate explanation of the opening sentences in the Latin summary of Clement’s comments on the Second Epistle. If the explanation of the title of the First Epistle, or of all three, is to be sought in this passage of Clement, Zahn’s hypothesis offers the most probable solution of the question. But our knowledge is too scanty to enable us to attain to certainty in the matter.

(3) Lücke has accepted the suggestion which, according to him, was first made by Gieseler, that πάρθους has arisen out of a misunderstanding of the title πάρθενος which was given to S. John (cf. Pistis Sophia, ed. Petermann, p. 45, εὖγε Johannes παρθένος, qui ἀρχεῖ in regno lucis, quoted by Zahn, Acta Johannis, p. ci, who traces back the probable origin of the tradition of John’s “virginity” to the Leucian Acts).

But whatever may be said for these ingenious conjectures, there is no reason to suppose that the title which we find in Augustine, and which may have been used by Clement of Alexandria, rests on any trustworthy tradition about the destination of the Epistles. We have nothing but internal evidence to guide us in determining the question. Nothing in the Epistles themselves affords any clear guidance in the matter; but the evidence, such as it is, gives us no reason to distrust the tradition which connects them with Asia Minor, and especially Ephesus. The Apocalypse is clearly connected with Ephesus, and we are certainly justified in attributing all the Johannine Books to the same school, though not to the same author. The question cannot really be discussed apart from the Gospel. The district of Asia Minor meets all the known requirements of the case, and the literary history of the Epistles, as well as of the Gospel, shows that it is in this region that we first meet with traces of their existence. It is natural, therefore, to suppose that the origin and destination of the Epistles are to be found in this region.

§ 4. ANALYSIS.

While some agreement is found with regard to the possible division of the First Epistle into paragraphs, no analysis of the Epistle has been generally accepted. The aphoristic character of the writer’s meditations is the real cause of this diversity of arrangement, and perhaps the attempt to analyse the Epistle should be abandoned as useless.

According to Von Soden (Die Schriften des NT. i. 1, p. 459), the commonest system of κεφάλαια and ὑποδιαιρέσεις is as follows:
Κεφαλαία Ἰωαννοῦ ἐπιστολῆς πρώτης

α. (i. 1) επαγγελικὴ θεολογία περὶ Χριστοῦ, εν ὦ.
   (i. 6) περὶ εξομολογήσεως καὶ προσοχῆς εἰς τὸ μὴ αμαρτανεῖν.
   (ii. 3) οτι η ὁρIENTATION εὐπολῶν θεοῦ τῆν γνώσιν βεβαιοῦ.

β. (ii. 7) περὶ ἀγαπῆς ὑπὸ ἀνευ ἀσεβεία, εν ὦ.
   (ii. 12) παρανεώσεις περὶ χαρίτος εκαστοῦ καθ ἡλικίαν καὶ περὶ ἀποτροπῆς τῆς πρὸς τὸν κόσμον ἀγαπῆς.

γ. (ii. 18) περὶ ψευδαφελῶν ἀρνησιῶν καὶ οτι η εἰς Χριστοῦ εὐπολήσει πατρος ὁμολογία, η γαρ τού πατρος δόξου του εκτοῦ εἰς θεολογία, εν ὦ.
   (ii. 26) περὶ θεοὺς καὶ πνευματικοῦ χαρίσματος εἰς

δ. (iii. 9 or 10) περὶ αγαπῆς τῆς εἰς τὸν πλῆθον καὶ διάθεσις μεταδότικης, εν ὦ.
   (iii. 19) περὶ συνειδησεως αγαθῆς τῆς εἰς πιστει Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.
   (iv. 1) περὶ διακρισίων πνευματῶν εφ ὁμολογία τῆς Χριστοῦ εὐανάθρωσις.

ε. (iv. 7) περὶ ϕιλαδελφίας εἰς θεοσέβειαν.

ζ. (iv. 15 or v. 1) περὶ θεολογίας εἰς τον πιστεύω τὸν Χριστὸν εἰς ἔλπιδι.

ξ. (v. 16) περὶ αντιληψεως τοῦ αμαρτανοντος ἀδελφοῦ διὰ

Κεφαλαία Ἰωαννοῦ ἐπιστολῆς δεύτερας.

α. (i. 4) μετα τὸ προοίμιον περὶ ὁρίου βιοῦ εἰς ἀγαπῆ
   (i. 10) οτι ουδεις καὶ εὐχαριστίας τῶν ἀνθρώπων διὰ Χριστοῦ, εν ὦ.

β. (i. 12) επαγγελία παροντισμὸς αὐτοῦ εἰς ἑλπίδι πρὸ

Κεφαλαία Ἰωαννοῦ ἐπιστολῆς τρίτης.

α. (i. 2) εὐχή ὑπὲρ τελειωθεὶς καὶ εὐχαριστίας εἰς
   (i. 9) περὶ τῆς Διωσωρίου φαυλοτητος καὶ μισαδελφίας.

By far the most successful attempt to analyse the Epistle in such a manner as to show that there is a real underlying sequence of thought which can be represented, at least to some extent, in the form of analysis, is that of Theodor Häring ("Gedankengang und Grundgedanke des ersten Johannesbriefs," Theol. Abhandlungen, Carl von Weizsäcker gewidmet, Freiburg i. B., 1892, Mohr). He finds in the Epistle a triple presentation of two leading ideas, which may be called an Ethical and a Christological Thesis. (1) The ethical thesis is developed in the sections i. 5–ii. 17, ii. 28 (?)–iii. 24, iv. 7–21, "without walking in light," more specially defined as "love of the brethren, there can be no fellowship with God." (2) The Christological thesis is found in the sections ii. 18–27, iv. 1–6, v. 1 (or 5)–12, "beware of those who deny that Jesus is the Christ." In the first part (i. 5–ii. 27) these ideas are presented, the one after the other, without any indication of their connection with each other. In the second (ii. 28 (?)–iv. 6), they are again presented in the same order, but vv. 23, 24 of ch. iii., which form the transition from the one to the other, are so worded as to bring out clearly the intimate connection which, in the author's mind, exists between the two. In the third (iv. 7–v. 12), they are so intertwined that it is difficult, if not impossible, to separate them.

As Häring's analysis has generally been followed in the notes of this edition, it may be convenient to give it here, at least in substance.¹

i. 1–4. Introduction.
A. i. 5–ii. 27. First presentation of the two tests of fellowship with God (ethical and Christological theses) expressed negatively. First exposure of the two "lies." No reference to the mutual relations of the two theses.
I. i. 5–ii. 17. Walking in light the true sign of fellowship with God (ethical thesis). Refutation of the first "lie."
I. i. 5–ii. 6. The thesis itself put forward in two parallel statements.
   a. i. 5–10 (vv. 8–10 being subordinate to the main thought, to guard against possible misunderstanding).
   b. ii. 1–6. (1b and 2 being similarly subordinate). The chief differences between a and b consist in the terms used, Fellowship with God, Knowledge of God, Being in God; and Walking in Light,

¹ In one part an attempt at a different analysis has been substituted (iii. 11–24) where I find myself unable to follow that of Häring.
Keeping the Commandments, Not-sinning, Keeping the Word.

2. ii. 7–17. The thesis, and the warning which it suggests, put forward on the grounds of the reader's circumstances and experience. The old command is ever new, because the full revelation of God is working in them. Further definition of walking in light and keeping the command as love of the brethren, as opposed to love of the world.

Subsections:
- b. ii. 12–17. Individual application. Warning against love of the world.

II. ii. 18–27. Faith in Jesus as Christ the test of fellowship with God (Christological thesis). Refutation of the second "lie."
- 1. ii. 18. Appearance of Antichrists a sign of the last hour.
- 2. ii. 19–21. Their relation to the community.
- 3. ii. 22–25. Content and significance of their false teaching.
- 4. ii. 26–27. Repeated assurance that the readers are in possession of the truth.

B. ii. 28–iv. 6. Second presentation of the two theses, separately, but with special emphasis (cf. iii. 22–24) on their connection.
- I. ii. 28–iii. 24. Doing of Righteousness (which in essence is identical with love of the brethren) the sign by which we may know that we are born of God. Warning suggested by this truth.
- 1. ii. 28–iii. 6. The thesis and the warning that we must recognize its truth, considered in connection with the duty of self-purification which is laid upon us by the gift of sonship and the hope of its consummation. Earnest warning (1) that there are more "Anomians" than is supposed, (2) that knowledge of God and sin are incompatible.

Subsections:
- a. ii. 28–iii. 3.
- b. iii. 4–6.
- 2. iii. 7–18. Explanation of the thesis, with earnest warning against deceivers.
- b. iii. 10–17. By more particular definition of sin as failure to love the brethren, and of love as the opposite of this.
- iii. 11, 12. [The nature and motives of love and hate.
Hatred and death. The example of Christ, the revelation of love.

iii. 17, 18. The lesser proof of love and its absence.

3. iii. 19–22. This is the test by which we may know if we are of the truth, and so still the accusations of our heart. Confidence in God and the hearing of prayer.

iii. 23, 24. Transition to the second thesis. The command summed up in the two duties of belief and love. Obedience issues in fellowship. The test by which the reality of the fellowship may be proved. The gift of the Spirit.

II. iv. 1–6. The Christological thesis. The Spirit which is of God confesses Jesus Christ come in flesh.

1. iv. 1–3. Content of the confession.

2. iv. 4–6. Attitude of the Church and the world.

C. iv. 7–v. 12. Third presentation of the theses. Both are shown to be connected. The reasons why they cannot be separated are given. Love the proof of fellowship with God, because God is Love. This love of God shown in the sending of His Son, as faith conceives it. Intentional intermingling of the two leading thoughts in two sections.

I. First explanation of the two ideas as now combined. Love based on faith in the revelation of love the proof of knowing God and being born of God.

1. iv. 7–12. Love based on the revelation of love.

   a. 7–10.

   b. 11, 12.

2. iv. 13–16. Faith in this revelation of love in Jesus through the Spirit.

3. iv. 17–21. This love based on faith in its relation to Judgment (17–18), recapitulation (19–21).

II. Second explanation of the connected thoughts. Faith as the base of love.

1. v. 1a. Faith the proof of being born of God.

2. v. 1b–4. As the ground of love of the brethren, love of God the sign of love of the brethren.

3. v. 5–12. Faith, in its assurance, the witness that Jesus is the Christ.

v. 13–21. Conclusion.

The divisions adopted by Mr. R. Law in his study of the First Epistle (The Tests of Life: Edinburgh, T. & T. Clark, 1909) have many points of agreement with Häring's scheme. He finds in the Epistle a threefold application of three tests by which the readers may satisfy themselves of their being "begotten of God."
First Cycle, i. 5–ii. 28. The Christian life as fellowship with God, conditioned and tested by walking in the light.

Walking in the light tested by—
   a. Righteousness, i. 6–ii. 6.
   b. Love, ii. 7–17.
   c. Belief, ii. 18–28.

Second Cycle, ii. 29–iv. 6. The Christian life as that of Divine Sonship, approved by the same tests.

Divine Sonship tested by—
   a. Righteousness, ii. 29–iii. 10a.
   b. Love, iii. 10b–24a.

Section I. iv. 7–v. 3a. Love.
   a. The genesis of love, iv. 7–12.
   b. The synthesis of belief and love, iv. 13–16.
   c. The effect, motives, and manifestations of love, iv. 17–v. 3a.

Section II. v. 3b–21. Belief.
   a. The power, content, basis, and issue of Christian belief, v. 3a–12.

The substantial agreement of this analysis with that of Häring is remarkable, as Mr. Law explains in an appended note that Häring's article was unknown to him at the time when he wrote the chapter which contains his analysis. It fails, however, to separate off the "Epilogue," and is hardly so helpful as Häring's scheme in tracing the (probable) sequence of thought. In parts it becomes rather an enumeration of subjects than an analysis. It also obscures the writer's insistence that the showing of love, in the sphere where circumstances made it possible, i.e. to the brethren, is the first and most obvious expression of the righteousness which is obedience to God's command, and which belief in Jesus as the Christ inspires.

An interesting correspondence between Dr. Westcott and Dr. Hort about the Divisions of the First Epistle has been published by the Rev. A. Westcott in the Expositor (iii. 481 ff., 1907). It contains several schemes, of which the most interesting is Dr. Hort's Second Scheme of Divisions (p. 486) and his remarks upon it (p. 485 f.). The scheme is as follows:
   i. 1–4. Introduction.
   i. 5–ii. 17. God and the true light: goodness, not indifference.
   ii. 18–iii. 24. Sonship to God, and hence likeness to His Son, and of abiding in Him.

One paragraph of his appended remarks is so suggestive that it must be quoted in full. ἐκ The base of all, the first and the last, is the Christian knowledge, 'That which we have seen and heard' (οἴδαμεν). This is the necessary condition of Faith (II.), which is the necessary condition of Love (I.), which is the necessary condition of obedience (I.). After the Prologue we begin with this last simplest region, and feel our way downwards, naturally taking with us the results already obtained. Obedience is associated with light and the Father; Love, with abiding and the Anointed Son; Faith, with truth and the Spirit. It would be difficult to find in the whole literature of the Johannine Epistles a more helpful clue in tracing the underlying connections of the "aphoristic meditations" contained in this Epistle. Mr. Law does not say whether this correspondence was known to him when he framed his scheme. If not, his underlying agreement with the suggestions of this paragraph, though not with the actual scheme proposed, is highly significant. But his threefold presentation of a twofold idea brings out more clearly the writer's meaning and purpose. Belief and practice, faith and works, and the connection between the two, is his real subject. The showing of love is the most obvious example of the doing of righteousness (= obedience).

§ 5. THE FALSE TEACHERS.

The exact nature of the false teaching which is denounced in these Epistles has been much disputed, and is still a matter of controversy. The opponents have been held to be Jews, or Judaizing Christians, or Gnostics, Judaizing or heathen, or some particular sect of Gnostics, Basilides, Saturninus, Valentinus or Cerinthus. Some have supposed the chief error denounced to be Docetism, others Antinomianism. A majority of interpreters still perhaps regard Cerinthianism, or teaching similar in canacter and tendency, as the main object of the writer's denunciation. This view has, however, been seriously challenged in late years by several writers, among whom Wurm and Clemen deserve special consideration. Though they differ in their solution of the problem, they both maintain that the common view is untenable, especially in the light of 1 Jn. ii. 23, which they regard as limiting the doctrinal differences between the writer and his opponents to questions of Christology; and as demonstrating that with regard to the doctrine of the Father, their views must have been identical, or at least divided by no serious difference of opinion. This would, of course, exclude Cerinthianism, as defined by Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. i. xxvi. 1, where the Creator of the world is described as virtus quaedam valde separata et distans ab ea principalitate quae est super universa et ignorans eum qui est super omnia Deum. Wurm finds in this verse convincing support for his view of the purely Jewish character of the opponent's teaching. Clemen draws from it and the preceding verse the conclusion that the writer sees the most serious error of his opponents in their denial that the historical Jesus is the Christ in the Johannine sense of that term, \textit{i.e.} the pre-existent Son of God, who alone can reveal the Father to men. But they both agree that the position of Cerinthus is excluded. They certainly have done good service in drawing attention to the importance of the bearing of 1 Jn. ii. 23 on the subject, even if further consideration may suggest that the conclusion which they have drawn is not inevitable.

\textit{One or Many?}

Before examining in greater detail the character of the views held by the false teachers, it may be well to consider whether the writer has in view the opinions of one party only in all the sections in which he denounces false teaching, or whether he is combating different enemies in different passages. The unity of the false teaching is assumed by Wurm and by Clemen, and is accepted by perhaps the majority of writers on the subject. In one sense this is probably true. The writer does not attack the Christological opinions of two or more definite parties in chs. ii., iv., and v. respectively, nor does he denounce the Christology of one party and the ethical shortcomings of another. The views which the writer's statements justify us in attributing to his opponents are not necessarily inconsistent. They might all have been held by the same party. But they do not form a complete system. They might have been held in conjunction with other opinions of the most diverse characters. The work of reconstruction is always fascinating. But we have to remember how few of the necessary bricks are supplied to us, and how large a proportion of the building material we have to fashion for ourselves. We are bound, therefore, to consider carefully any hints which the writer himself gives us as to whether he has one or many opponents to meet, and whether he regards them as confined within one fold.

The expressions which he uses certainly suggest variety. He tells us that the popular expectation is being fulfilled, though not exactly in the way in which people were looking for it. The saying, “Antichrist cometh,” is finding its fulfilment in the many Antichrists who have come to be (i. 18). This hardly suggests one leader and many likeminded followers, even if the various sections have all separated themselves off from the true body (ἐξ ἡμῶν ἐξῆλθαν). The readers are reminded that every lie (πᾶν ψεῦδος) shows the characteristic of being derived from some source other than the truth. The Antichrist is characterized by his denial that Jesus is the Christ. But every one that denies Him to be the pre-existent Son of God is cut off from all true knowledge of the Father (ii. 23). This statement is made with reference to those who lead astray (περὶ τῶν πλανών ὑμᾶς). The same variety of error may be traced in ch. iv. The readers are warned not to give credence to every spiritual utterance. The many spirits must be tested, because many false prophets have gone out into the world (iv. 1). Every spirit which denies Jesus is “not of God.” This denial is the mark of Antichrist, who is already working in the world in the doings of his many subordinates. It is only in the fifth chapter that the writer seems to deal more exclusively with one particular form of error, the denial that Jesus who is the Son of God (οὐτὸς) came by blood as well as by water, i.e. that both His sufferings and His death were essential parts of His Messianic work of salvation. This passage should not be allowed to outweigh the impression left by the earlier chapters, that varieties of false teaching are in the writer’s mind in most of what he has to say. And even in the fifth chapter most of the expressions used leave the same impression. Throughout he tries to fortify his readers by calling to their remembrance a few fundamental truths which will safeguard them from the attacks of all the varied dangers which threaten their faith, even if by way of illustration he refers more particularly to one attack which they had lately victoriously repelled. Truth is one, error is manifold, is the burden of his message throughout. And error which is manifold threatens in more forms than one.

Thus, if we may consider first the passages in which doctrinal errors are denounced apart from those which deal with moral dangers, the general impression left by these passages and by many individual expressions which occur in them, leads to the conclusion that the Epistle is directed against various forms of teaching. The writer sums up the different tendencies in them which seem to him most dangerous, and most characteristic of the times. He sets out clearly the corresponding truths which in his opinion will prove to be their safest antidote. At the same time his writing may have been occasioned by one special type of false teaching, or one special incident in the history of his Church in connection with it.

With this general caution in view it will be well to consider next how far various types of teaching are possibly reflected in the Epistle.

(a) Judaism.

If one single enemy is in view, it cannot, of course, be the Jews who have never accepted Christianity. Those of whom the writer is thinking first are men who "have gone out from us." The phrases used, in spite of the words "they were not of us," point to a definite secession of men who called themselves Christians and were recognized as such. They cannot refer to a sharper division between Jews and Christians who had hitherto been on more friendly terms. But this obvious fact does not necessarily exclude all reference in the Epistle to non-Christian Jews. The writer's object is clear. It is to keep his readers in the right path, which some of their former companions have been persuaded to leave. He must protect those who remain from all the dangers which threaten most seriously. And his insistence on the confession that Jesus is the Messiah makes it probable, if not certain, that the Jewish controversy was prominent among the dangers which threatened most loudly. The Jewish War and the destruction of Jerusalem must, of course, have affected most profoundly the relations of Judaism to Christianity. And the effect must have become manifest very soon after the taking of the Holy City. It not only embittered the hatred between Jews and Christians, which was often acute enough before, but it placed Jewish Christians who had not broken with their national hopes and aspirations in an almost desperate position. They had still perhaps hoped against hope for the recognition of Jesus as the Messiah by the majority of their nation. All such hopes had now been dashed to the ground. The Lord had not returned to save His people and nation, as they had hoped even to the last. And Christians had not been slow to point to the fate of Jerusalem as God's punishment on the nation for their rejection of the Christ. Jewish Christians could no longer expect anything but the bitterest hatred from the members of their own nation with whom they had hoped for reunion. Their Lord had delayed His promised return. And many were ready to ask in scorn, "Where is the promise of His coming?" It is hardly surprising if their Jewish brethren succeeded in persuading some at least among them that they had been mistaken in supposing that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah of their nation. And if some openly cast in their lot with their own nation, others who still remained faithful may have been sorely tempted to accept the view that Jesus was indeed a prophet, sent by God and endowed by Him with higher powers, but not the Deliverer of the nation, and not the unique Son of God, with whom the writer and his fellow Christians identified Him. Such a danger threatened primarily, of course, only Jewish Christians, but it affected the whole body. For it was an essential part of the Christian creed as they apprehended it that salvation is of the Jews. The Jewish controversy was prominent throughout the first half of the second century. It may have reached its height about the time of Barcochba’s rebellion. But it must have entered upon an acute stage within a few years of the Fall of Jerusalem. It must have been a serious danger at any period to which it is possible to assign the date of our Epistle.

In this connection it is natural to take into account the evidence of the Fourth Gospel. It is hardly necessary to restate at any great length the obvious fact that the needs of the Jewish controversy are a dominant factor in the Evangelist’s choice of subject-matter and method of presentation. His hostility to his own nation, or rather to those who in his opinion falsely represented it and had proved unfaithful to its true vocation, is one of the most prominent characteristics of his work. In the Epistle it is far less prominent, but it is difficult to discover any real difference in the situations which the Gospel and the Epistle presuppose in this respect.

On the other hand, it is unsafe to deduce the Jewish character of the false teaching denounced from the words of ch. ii. 22 f., πᾶς δ’ ἀρνούμενος τὸν νόμον ὑπὸ τοῦ πατέρα ἐχει κ.τ.λ., as Wurm has done. He draws the following conclusions from the passage. (1) The false teachers themselves are not conscious of holding any views of God different from those of the faithful. (2) There was, in fact, no such difference in their teaching except such as was involved in the denial of the Son, the Revealer of the Father. The last statement is rather vague. It would admit of considerable differences of view as to the nature of the Father. And the first statement does not necessarily follow from the verses which are supposed to establish it. It is true, as Wurm and Clemen have pointed out, that the author states the fact that the false teachers “have not the Father” as a consequence of their Christology. He could hardly have written the words unless these teachers actually claimed to “have the Father.” But it does not follow that they claimed the possession in the same sense as orthodox Christians claimed it. And the whole passage loses in point unless there actually were real differences of view. The words can no doubt be interpreted of Jews whose conception of God was not materially different from that of Christians. But they are equally applicable, and they have far more point, if the writer has in view types of Gnostic thought, in which a claim was made to superior knowledge of the unknown Father imparted to a few spiritual natures, and unattainable by the average Christian. Of such teaching the views attributed to Cerinthus by Irenaeus may, at any rate, serve as an illustration.

Post baptismum descendisse in eum ab ea principalitate quae est super omnia Christum figura columbae, et tunc annunciasse incognitum patrem. We compare the Greek of Epiphanius, ἀποκαλύψαι αὐτῷ καὶ δι’ αὐτοῦ τοὺς μετ’ αὐτοῦ τὸν ἀγνωστὸν πατέρα. Writers like Clemen and Wurm have assumed, perhaps too readily, that one possible interpretation of the passage is the only possible explanation.

(b) Gnosticism.

The connection of the Epistle with Gnostic ideas is quite apparent. There is, of course, no more necessity to interpret the phrase ὅ λέγων ὅτι ἔγνωκα αὐτὸν as presupposing any definite form of Gnosticism unknown before the second century, than there is to do so in the case of the Pauline ἡ γνώσις φυσιῶν, or εἴ τις ἀγαπᾷ τὸν θεὸν οὗτος ἔγνωσται ὑπ’ αὐτοῦ. Though σπέρμα may be the terminus technicus of Gnosis, our author’s doctrine of γεννηθῆναι ἐκ θεοῦ will explain its use in iii. 9, however we may interpret the meaning of σπέρμα in the phrase (σπέρμα αὐτοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ μένει). A reference to the system of Basilides is far from being the only possible explanation (Pfleid. ii. 414). But Gnostic ideas are clearly a serious menace to the readers. The essence of the writer’s ἀγγελία is that God is light, and the following reiteration of this in negative form may well be aimed at the view that the Father of all is unknowable, or that what can be known of Him is revealed exclusively to a few (σκοτία ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἐστὶν οὐδεμία, cf. οἴδατε πάντες), unless, indeed, σκοτία must be taken in an ethical sense, as in what follows (there can be no fellowship with God, who is all light, for those who fail to obey His ἐντολαί). The condemnation of those who say that they “have not sin” points in the same direction. The use of the first person plural shows that the danger is regarded as imminent, if not actually present among the members of the community. The intellectual claims of the “illuminati” are met by insistence on the duty of love, and the obligations which it involves. And the confession demanded of “Jesus Christ come in the flesh” is the writer’s protest against the Gnostic doctrine of the impossibility of any real and complete union between the spiritual seed and that which is flesh (cf. Jn. i. 14). The writer’s own sympathy with many Gnostic ideas is well known. Perhaps his greatest service, not only to his own generation but to all times, is his power “of absorbing into Christianity the great spiritual tendencies of his age,” thus “disarming their possible antagonism for his own age” and perpetuating their influence in subsequent ages.

(c) Docetism.

The connection of this Epistle and 2 Jn. with Docetism has been recognized from early times. Cf. Polycarp, vii., πᾶς γὰρ ὃς ἀν μὴ ὁμολογῇ ᾿Ιησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθέναι ἀντίχριστός ἐστιν: Tertullian, De carne Christi, xxiv.; Dion. Alex. ap. Eus. H. E. vii. 25. 19, ταύτα γὰρ (1 Jn. i. 2, 3) προανακρούεται, διατεινόμενος, ὥς ἐν τοῖς ἐξῆς ἐδήλωσεν, πρὸς τοὺς οὐκ ἐν σαρκὶ φάσκοντας ἐληλυθέναι τὸν κύριον. And the same view has found favour down to the present time. It is to be found in the Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher. Cf. Schmiedel, EBOJ, p 29, “Concerning Jesus these opponents of the writer taught that He is not the Christ (ii. 22). Here, too, we recognize again the assertion of the Gnostics, that Jesus is only the man with whom the Christ who came down from heaven was united for a time, and only in some loose kind of connection” (nur lose; cf. DVE, p. 116, nur äusserlich). This is seen more clearly in iv. 2 (DVE). They denied that Jesus Christ came in flesh; an expression directed equally against the other view of the Gnostics, that “He had a body only in appearance.” Cf. Encycl. Bibl., s.v. John, son of Zebedee, 57, “More precisely the false teachers disclose themselves to be Docetics.” It is, however, unfortunate that the term “Docetism” has both a wider and a narrower signification. It can be used in a more popular sense to characterize all teaching which denied the reality of the Incarnation, and therefore the reality and completeness of the Lord’s humanity. It may also be used more precisely of teaching which assigned to the Lord a merely phantasmal body, maintaining that He had a human body, of flesh and blood, only in appearance. The expressions used by Polycarp do not necessarily go beyond the wider and more popular usage. They contain no certain reference to Docetism in the stricter sense of the term. And the language of the Johannine Epistles does not necessarily presuppose the more precise Docetism. A comparison of the language of Ignatius makes this quite clear. Cf. Ign. ad Smyrn. ii. καὶ ἀληθῶς ἔπαθεν, ὡς καὶ ἀληθῶς ἀνέστησεν ἑαυτόν. οὐχ ὥσπερ ἄπιστοι τινες λέγουσιν τὸ δοκεῖν αὐτὸν πεπονθέναι, αὐτοὶ τὸ δοκεῖν ὄντες, καὶ καθὼς φρονοῦσιν καὶ συμβίβασται αὐτοῖς, οὕτως ἀσωμάτοις καὶ δαιμονικοῖς: ad Trall. x, εἰ δὲ ... λέγουσιν τὸ δοκεῖν πεπονθέναι αὐτὸν, αὐτοὶ ὄντες τὸ δοκεῖν, ἐγὼ τί δέδεμαι; The watchword "Jesus Christ come in flesh" held good against both these forms of teaching, and the former naturally led to the latter. All Gnostic insistence on the incompatibility of flesh and spirit led in the same direction. But there is nothing in our Epistles which proves the existence of the stricter Docetism to which the letters of Ignatius bear witness. The false teachers are still apparently concerned with the earlier stage of the problem, the relation between the real man Jesus of Nazareth and the higher power with which He was brought into temporary connection.

(d) Cerinthianism.

We have seen, if the suggested interpretation of the Christological passages is in the main correct, that the author is trying to strengthen his readers' defences against dangers which threaten from more than one quarter. As the Epistle proceeds, however, one particular danger becomes more prominent, and the passage in ch. v. contains clearer reference to one definite form of error than is probably to be found in the earlier chapters. Since the days when Polycarp told the story of John, the disciple of the Lord, and Cerinthus in the Baths of Ephesus, the view has been commonly held that the Johannine Epistles, if not the Gospel as well (cf. Jerome, /Joann.), were directed, at any rate in part, again the heresy of Cerinthus. This view has been seriously challenged by many writers. The grounds on which Wurm and Clemen have declared against it have been already considered. If the statements of ii. 23 f. do not exclude the teaching of Cerinthus about the unknown Father, and the creation of the world (non a primo Deo factum esse mundum docuit sed a virtute quaedam ulde separatam ab ea principalitate quae est super universa et ignorante eum qui est super omnia Deum), the more definite references of ch. v. (especially οὐκ ἐν τῷ ὕδατι μόνον ἀλλ’ ἐν τῷ ὕδατι καὶ ἐν τῷ αἵματι) are certainly more easily explained in connection with the teaching of Cerinthus, as recorded by Irenaeus (et post baptismum descendisse in eum ab ea principalitate quae est super omnia Christum figuram columbae, et tunc annunciasse incognitum patrem, et ...
The writer is denouncing the view that the passion was no essential part of the Messianic work of salvation. While they admitted that His baptism by John was a real mark of His Messianic career, a means by which He was fitted to carry out His work for men, the opponents refused to see a similar mark in the Crucifixion. He came by water but not by blood. This corresponds admirably with what Irenaeus tells of Cerinthus, and the reference to Cerinthianism is strongly maintained by Zahn (Einleitung, sec. 70), and also by writers of a different school, as Knopf (Nachapostol. Zeit. p. 328 ff.). So far as concerns the type of teaching which is referred to, there can be little doubt that it is the most probable view. But as the exact tenets of Cerinthus are a matter of dispute, it may be well to consider the accounts of it which we possess in greater detail.

Our chief authorities for the views of Cerinthus are Irenaeus and Hippolytus. As usual the contents of Hippolytus’ Syntagma must be deduced, and in part conjectured, from the writings of Epiphanius, Philaster, and pseudo-Tertullian. The Refutatio of (?) Hippolytus gives us hardly anything beyond material for reconstructing the original Greek of Irenaeus (Hipp. Philos. vii. 33). And as usual the Epiphanian account affords an interesting field for conjecture, where his statements cannot be checked by the other two writers who used the Syntagma, and are not derived from Irenaeus.

The Syntagma of Hippolytus must have contained at least the following information: (1) Cerinthus was the successor of Carpocrates. (2) His teaching resembled that of his predecessor as regards (a) The person of Christ. He was the son of Joseph and Mary. Philaster, Cerinthus successit huius errori et simulitudinit vanitatis docens de generatione Salvatoris; ps.-Tert. Similia docens, Christum ex semine Ioseph natum proponeit, hominem illum tantummodo sine divinitate contendens; Epiph. τὰ ἵσα προερημεύω εἰς τὸν Χριστὸν συκοφαντήσας ἐξηγεῖται καὶ οὗτος ἐκ Μαρίας καὶ ἐκ σπέρματος Ιωσήφ τὸν Χριστὸν γεγενήσθαι. (4) The creation of the world. The world was made by angels. Cf. Phil. demque creatura angelorum; ps.-Tert. nam et ipse mundum institutum esse ab angelis (which Hilgenfeld has rightly restored for illis); Epiph. καὶ τὸν κόσμον ὄρμοις ὑπὸ ἀγέλων γεγενήσθαι.

His teaching differed from that of Carpocrates in its more sympathetic attitude towards Judaism. Cf. Phil. in nullo discordans ab illo eo nisi quia ex parte solum legis consentit quod a Deo data sit, which Lipsius rightly restores in Greek, ἀλλ’ ἡ ἑν
§ 5. THE FALSE TEACHERS xlvii

toúτῳ μόνον ἐν τῷ ὄρμοι ὁμολογεῖν ἀπὸ μέρους τῶν νόμον, ὅτι ἀπὸ ὁμολογεῖ

τὸν νόμον, ὅτι ἀπὸ θεοῦ δίδοται. Epiph. ἐν τῷ προσέχειν τῷ 'Ἰουδαίων ὁμολογεῖν ἀπὸ μέρους. The Synagma would seem also to have stated that Cerinthus regarded the God of the Jews as an angel, and probably as one of the κοσμοποιοὶ ἀγγέλου, by one of whom the Law was given to Israel. Cf. ps.-Tert. ipsam quoque legem ab angelis datam perhibens, Iudaeorum Deum non Dominum sed angelum promens; Epiph. φάσκει δὲ οὗτος τὸν νόμον καὶ τοὺς προφήτας ύπὸ ἀγγέλων δεδόσθαι, καὶ τὸν δεδωκότα νόμον ἐνα ἐναι τῶν ἀγγέλων τῶν τῶν κόσμων πετουκότων, in the light of which we must interpret the sentence of Philaster, unintelligible as it stands, et ipsam Deum Iudaeorum eum esse aestimat qui legem dedit filiis Israel.

From this point onwards there is nothing more to be gathered from pseud.-Tertullian. Philaster adds a number of further details which emphasize the Judaizing character of Cerinthus' teaching and views. He tells us that he insisted on circumcision (cf. Epiph. ch. v. περιετμήθη μὴ Ἰσραήλ περιτμήθητι καὶ αὐτός), and on the keeping of the Sabbath; and that he taught that Christ had not yet risen from the dead, but would rise hereafter (Christum nondum surrexisse a mortuis sed resurrectorum annuntiat”; cf. Epiph. ch. vi. Χριστὸν Παῦλον ἀθετοῦσι) ; that he paid honour to the traitor Judas; that he acknowledged the Gospel according to S. Matthew only (cf. Epiph. ch. v. τὸν Παῦλον ἀθετοῦσι) ; that he rejected the authority of S. Paul (cf. Epiph. ch. v. τὸν Παῦλον ἀθετοῦσι) ; that he paid honour to the traitor Judas; that he acknowledged the Gospel according to S. Matthew only (cf. Epiph. ch. v. τὸν Παῦλον ἀθετοῦσι), rejecting the other three Gospels and the Acts; that he blasphemes the blessed Martyrs; and that he was the mover of the sedition against the Apostles, insisting on the circumcision of all converts; and that the Apostolic decree was promulgated against the movement instigated by him (cf. Epiph. ch. iii, who also adds to his crimes the opposition to S. Paul on his last visit to Jerusalem). The agreements between Epiphanius and Philaster are sufficiently marked to justify the view that Hippolytus in his Synagma assigned some such Judaizing position to Cerinthus, though the attribution of many of the same tenets to "Ebion," by Hippolytus and by Irenaeus, raises doubts as to the accuracy of the details. The Synagma is in substantial agreement with Irenaeus as to Cerinthus' views about the person of Christ and the creation of the world by an inferior power. The Judaizing views attributed to him are not inconsistent with anything in Irenaeus' account. The only statement that really conflicts with his account is that concerning the resurrection of Christ. But we have found nothing so far to connect the teaching about the Baptism and Passion, given by Irenaeus, which offers the most striking resemblances to that denounced in ch. v. of the Epistle, with the earlier Hippolytean treatise. Lipsius however, (p 118), finds reasons for doing so in that part of the Epiphanian account which is derived mainly from Irenaeus (i. 21, cf. Hipp. Philos. vii. 33). When all the definitely Irenaean matter is taken away, the remainder may be of the nature of explanatory additions made by Epiphanius himself; and this view is maintained by Hilgenfeld (Keisergeschichte des Urchristenthums, p. 413). But Lipsius thinks that it must be derived from another source. For the sake of clearness it will be best to give the passage in full.

_Epiphanius._

οὐκ ἀπὸ τῆς πρώτης καὶ ἀνωθεν δυνάμεως τὸν κόσμον γεγενηθαι, ἀνωθεν δὲ ἐκ τοῦ ἄνω θεοῦ μετά τὸ ἀδρυνθηκε τὸν Ἰησοῦν τὸν έκ σπέρματος Ἰωσῆφ καὶ Μαρίας γεγενημένον κατεληλυθαι τὸν Χριστὸν εἰς αὐτὸν, τούτωσι τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἄγιον, ἐν εἰδε περιστερᾶς ἐν τῷ Ιορδάνῃ καὶ ἀποκαλιστήθηκαν αὐτῷ καὶ δι’ αὐτοῦ τοῖς μετ’ αὐτοῦ τὸν ἀγνωστον πατέρα, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο ἐπειδὴ ἦλθεν ἡ δύναμις εἰς αὐτὸν ἀνωθεν δυνάμεις ἐπιτετελεκέναι, καὶ αὐτοῦ πεπονθότος τὸ ἐλθόν ἀνωθεν ἀναπτήκαν ἀπὸ τοῦ Ἰησοῦν ἀνωθεν δυνάμεις ἐπιτετελεκέναι, καὶ αὐτοῦ πεπονθότος τὸ ἐλθόν ἀνωθεν ἀναπτήκαν ἀπὸ τοῦ Ἰησοῦν ἀνωθεν ἀναπτήκαν εἰς αὐτοῦ ἀπαθή ἀναπτήκαν, ὅπερ ἐστὶ τὸ κατελθὸν ἐν εἰδε περιστερᾶς, καὶ ὡς τὸν Ἰησοῦν εἶναι τὸν Χριστὸν.

_Irenaeus (cf. Hipp. vii. 33)._

ὁχ ὑπὸ τοῦ πρώτου θεοῦ γεγονέναι τὸν κόσμον, ἀλλὰ ὑπὸ δυνάμεως τινὸς κεχωρισμένης καὶ ἀπεστάλθης τῆς ὑπὲρ τὰ βαπτιστήρια (ὁ αὐθεντικής, principalitate) καὶ ἀγνωστός τὸν ὑπὲρ πάντα θεοῦ, τὸν δΕ Ἰησοῦν ὑπέθετο μὴ ἐκ παρθένου γεγενηθαι (impossible enim hoc ei nisum est) γεγονενε δὲ αὐτοῦ ἐξ Ἰωσῆφ καὶ Μαρίας υἱὸν ὁμοίως τοῖς λοιποῖς ἡμᾶς καὶ δικαιώτερον γεγονενε [καὶ ἐφοβοῦσθης] καὶ ἐποιήθης τοῖς ἄνωθεν δυναμεῖς ἐπιτετελεκέναι, καὶ μετὰ τὸ βαπτισμα κατελθεῖν εἰς αὐτὸν τὸν ἄνωθεν ἀπὸ τῆς ὑπὲρ τὰ βαπτισμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἐν εἰδε περιστερᾶς καὶ τότε κηρύηξε τοῦ ἄγνωστον πατέρα, καὶ δυνάμεις ἐπιτετελεκέναι, πρὸς δὲ τοῦ τέλει ἀποστῆναι τὸν Χριστὸν αὐτοῦ τῆς Ἰησοῦν, καὶ τὸν Ἰησοῦν πεπονθέναι καὶ ἐγηγέρθαι, τὸν δὲ Χριστὸν ἀπαθή διαμεμεικέναι πνευματικὸν ὑπάρχοντα.

Apart from particular expressions, some of which find parallels in his account of Carpocrates (cf. Haer. xxvii. 2, τῆς ἄνω δυνάμεως, ἀπεστάλθατι ὑπὸ τοῦ αὐτοῦ πατρὸς εἰς τήν ἀνωθεν ψυχήν δυνάμεως), the non-Irenaean matter in Epiphanius is confined to the identification of the Christ who descended on Jesus with the Holy Spirit, the mention of the Jordan, the phrase τὸ ἐλθόν ἀνωθεν (ὁ ἀνωθεν ἐλθὼν), and the denial that Jesus is the Christ.
There is nothing here that Epiphanius could not have added by way of explanation and amplification. At the same time there is no obvious reason for the mention of the Spirit, unless Epiphanius is combining two accounts, one of which spoke of Christ and the other of the Holy Spirit as the power who descended on Jesus. It is noticeable that in Lipsius' attempted reconstruction of the Syzygyma (μετὰ δὲ ἁδρυνθῆναι τὸν Χριστὸν ἐληλυθέναι εἰς αὐτὸν τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον ἐν εἴδει περιστερᾶς καὶ ἀποκαλύψαι αὐτῷ καὶ δὲ αὐτοῦ τοῖς μετ' αὐτὸν τῶν ἀνω θεῶν, τὸν δὲ Χριστὸν ἐπειδὴ ἤλθεν εἰς αὐτόν ἀνωθεν δύναμις δύναμεις ἐπιτελεκέναι καὶ αὐτοῦ πεπονθότος τὸ κατελθὸν ἀναπτῆναι ἀνω) most of the matter and much of the language is to be found in Irenaeus. But on the whole it seems probable that the Hippolytean account did contain a statement that a higher power (? the Holy Spirit) came upon Jesus (? the Christ) and left Him before the Passion. And if the original teaching of Cerinthus was that the Spirit descended on Jesus at the Baptism, there is a special significance in the language of the Epistle, τὸ πνεῦμα ἐστὶ τὸ μαρτυροῦν. The place of the Spirit, the writer would say, was to bear witness, not to perform the higher function which some had attributed to Him. We may perhaps compare the language of the Prologue to the Gospel, where the over-estimation of the Baptist, whom possibly some had identified with the Messiah, and almost certainly many had extolled at the expense of Jesus of Nazareth, is similarly set aside (οὐκ ἦν ἐκεῖνος τὸ φῶς οὐ μαρτυρήσῃ περὶ τοῦ φωτός). And if this was the original teaching of Cerinthus, it would not be inconsistent with the stress laid on the denial that Jesus is the Christ. Even if he admitted that the descent of the Spirit at the Baptism raised Him to the Messianic office (more probably he would regard it as setting Him apart for a prophet), he certainly would not allow the identification of Jesus from his birth with the Christ, in the Johannine sense of the term, the pre-existent Son of God.

We may then safely conclude that though other forms of false teaching are dealt with in the Epistles, the writer has specially in view the teaching of some opponent whose views were, at any rate, very similar to those of Cerinthus, so far as we can now determine them. He seems to have combined those Gnostic and Judaizing tendencies which the writer regarded as most dangerous. And the particular views which we have good grounds for attributing to him, whether they defined the relation of Jesus to the Christ, or that of the Spirit to Christ (i.e. Jesus), offer the most satisfactory explanation of the language of the fifth chapter of the First Epistle.
Ethical Errors.

It is, of course, clear that the writer of these Epistles is combating errors of life and conduct as well as of doctrine. And it is almost a matter of certainty that he has in view the same opponents in what he says on both subjects. He could hardly have laid such stress on the necessary connection between true belief and right practice, if the errors of conduct which he denounces were conspicuously absent from the lives of those whose teaching he condemns. This has been clearly stated by Wurm, though he goes too far in maintaining that the praise which the writer bestows on his readers excludes the possibility that his warnings against certain practical errors could have special reference to them. It was clearly one of the chief dangers of the situation, as the writer viewed it, that those who had "gone out" had left many sympathizers behind, and many more who hardly knew how to make up their minds. There are, however, no grounds for supposing that in those passages which deal with moral shortcomings the writer has an altogether different party of opponents in view. As in the case of the Christological errors, he is content to point out the chief tendencies in which he foresees most danger. Again, his words have a wider reference than the one particular body of opponents, but he writes with the memory fresh in his mind of the recent withdrawal of a particular party from his Church, and their withdrawal was most probably the occasion of the First Epistle.

There is no evidence that this party had condoned, or been guilty of, the grosser sins of the flesh. That is not the most natural interpretation of the passage on which such a view has generally been based (ii. 16). By ἐπιθυμία τῆς σαρκός the writer seems to mean all desires which come to the natural man as yet untouched by the influence of the Spirit of God. The Johannine usage of the word σάρξ suggests this wider reference, by which the expressions used are not restricted to the fleshly sins.

But though the Epistle offers no traces of Antinomianism, it is clear that the opponents claimed that knowledge of God, fellowship with God, and love for God are compatible with disregard of at least some of the requirements of the Christian code. The words ὁ λέγων ὅτι ἔγνωκα αὐτὸν καὶ τὰς ἐντολὰς αὐτῶν μὴ τηρῶν ψεύστης ἐστίν are certainly directed against the false teachers, even if the writer is not thinking of them in i. 6, 8, 10. And in the following verse (ii. 5) the emphasis on ἀληθῶς (ἐν τούτῳ ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ τετελείωται) suggests the same thought. They must have claimed to know God as ordinary Christians could not know Him, without recognizing the obligation of complete obedience to the whole of His commands, or of living a life in conscious imitation of the life of the Master (δέχετε καθὼς ἐκεῖνος περιεπάτησεν καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ πρώτος περιπατεῖτο). The following section (ii. 7 ff.) on the "new command," however the "old" and the "new" are to be interpreted, shows that their special failure was a want of recognition in everyday life of the primary Christian duty, love of the brethren. The full significance of the passage is perhaps most apparent if we assume that the writer claims that the command to love the brethren is contained implicitly in the moral requirements of the Old Testament, recognized by himself and his opponents alike as having authority, but that it was placed in a wholly new light in the teaching and example of the Christ, who said ἐντολήν καὶ ἐντολήν δίδωμι ὑμῖν ἵνα ἀγαπᾶτε ἀλλήλους καθὼς ἤγάπησεν ὑμᾶς (Jn. xiii. 34); and that he makes the claim in opposition to a denial on the part of the false teachers that this was part of the requirements of God. They must have been unwilling to recognize that the ordinary and less enlightened members of the community had any real claims upon them. They may have preferred to stand well with the more intelligent Jews and heathen in whose midst they lived (μὴ ἀγαπᾶτε τὸν κόσμον), cf. ii. 15, 16.

The writer returns to the subject in ch. iii., to which ii. 29 leads up. As Weiss has pointed out, iii. 4 would be a feeble argument against Antinomianism. To meet that he must have exchanged his subject and predicate. But the passage is significant nevertheless. It most naturally suggests that the opponents condemned "lawlessness," but failed to see that all sin is lawless, being disobedience to the Divine law, which has been made known to men in various ways. The duty of obedience to certain definite precepts they recognized, but not the sinfulness of all falling short of the ideal of human life realized in the life of the Son of Man on earth. Again all becomes clear if we may suppose that their conduct was regulated by the moral precepts of the Old Testament rather than by the more exacting requirements of the "λόγος αὐτοῦ" which had now been put before men. In ver. 7 the words μηδεὶς πλανάτω ὑμᾶς may contain a more definite allusion to particular opponents. The doing of righteousness constitutes the only claim to be righteous, and again "He" has set the standard of doing (καθὼς ἐκεῖνος ἔστιν δίκαιος). The indifference of action as compared with other supposed qualifications, such as, for instance, descent from Abraham, or the possession of the "pneumatic" seed, is clearly part of the opponents' creed. They must have claimed to be δίκαιοι without admitting the necessity of "doing the works."

Thus on the practical as well as on the theoretical side we seem to trace the same mixture of Jewish and Gnostic ideas which must have formed the most pressing dangers to the moral and spiritual life of a Christian community towards the end of the first century or at the beginning of the second, or perhaps even later. Such matters really afford very little material for accurate dating. No account has been taken of the Chiliastic views attributed to Cerinthus by Caius of Rome and others. If the attribution is correct, they are not inconsistent with his Judaizing position. The implied suggestions of immorality are not supported by any tangible evidence. In all other respects the teaching attributed to Cerinthus by the more trustworthy heresiologists affords a typical example of the errors which are condemned in the Johannine Epistles.

In tracing the history of books and documents it is important to emphasize the difference between echoes, influences, direct use and direct quotation, with or without indication of authorship. Professor Bacon has rightly called attention to this in his recent work on the Johannine Problem. The distinction has always been recognized by competent scholars in dealing with the Books of the New Testament, though they have held very different opinions as to what may be reasonably concluded from the facts of usage. The undoubted attribution of the Epistles to John by name is not found in extant works till the last quarter of the second century. The use of them can, however, be traced at a much earlier date. The following list of “echoes and influences” of the Epistles which have been found in the writings of the second century and early decades of the third, are not all equally certain, but at least deserve consideration.

Clem. Rom. xlix. 5. ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ Τ iv. 18. ὁ δὲ φοβούμενος οὐ τετελειωθησαν πάντες οἱ ἐκλεκτοὶ τοῦ θεοῦ.
Clem. 1. 3. ἀλλ᾽ οἱ ἐν ἀγάπῃ τετελειωθέντες.

The verbal similarity is interesting, but the meaning is different at least in the first passage. The 49th chapter has clearer reminiscences of 1 Co. xiii. The opening sentence, ὃ ἔχων ἄγαπην ἐν Χριστῷ ποιησάτω τὰ τοῦ Χριστοῦ παραγγέλματα, suggests more clearly the teaching of the Johannine Epistles. But no weight can be attached to this coincidence of language.

Polycarp, ad Phil. c. vii. πᾶς γὰρ ἤσσος γὰρ ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα ἐκ σαρκὶ ἐληλυθέναι, ἀντίχριστος ἐστὶν. I iv. 2. πᾶν πνεῦμα ὁ ὁμολογεῖ ὃς ἤσσος ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα ἐκ σαρκὶ ἐληλυθέναι, ἀντίχριστος ἐστὶν.
The importance of this passage justifies a full presentation of the evidence. The connection between the passage in Polycarp and 1 Jn. iv. 2, or 2 Jn. 7, is obvious. No one who has read the Johannine Epistles and the Epistle of Polycarp can doubt on which side lies the probability of originality. And the way in which Polycarp seems to use the language and thoughts of the Johannine Epistles is closely parallel to his use throughout his Epistle of the language and contents of other books of the New Testament. The obvious connection of the first sentence with the language of S. John's Epistles makes it natural to see in the second, which contains the Johannine phrase ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου ἐστίν, an echo of the teaching of the First Epistle of S. John on the Passion as being, equally with the Baptism, characteristic of the Lord's Messianic work (οὗτός ἐστιν ὃ ἐλθὼν δι' ὕδατος καὶ ἁίματος). If so, the case for the connection with the First Epistle is strengthened. The sentences in Polycarp give the reason for his appeal to the Philippians to serve the Lord with all fear and reverence, as the Lord Himself commanded, and the Apostles who preached His Gospel to them, and the Prophets who predicted His coming, “abstaining from offences and from false brethren, and from those who bear the name of the Lord in hypocrisy, who lead foolish men astray” (οἵτινες ἀποπλανῶσι κενούς ἀνθρώπους, Cf. I Jn. ii. 26, ταῦτα ἔγραψα ὑμῖν περὶ τῶν πλανώντων ὑμᾶς). The context recalls the situation of the Second Epistle (2 Jn. to f.), the language and thought are more closely connected with the First. The passage may be said to prove the acquaintance of Polycarp with the teaching contained in the Epistles, or with the man who taught it. It establishes a very high degree of probability that he was acquainted with the actual Epistles. In view of it there would have to be very strong reasons to justify us in placing the Johannine Epistles later than the Epistle of Polycarp. And it must be remembered that his Epistle, if genuine, must be dated immediately after the martyrdom of Ignatius (see Polycarp, ad Phil. c. xiii.).

Papias (Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 3).

The use of the phrase αὐτὴ ἡ ἀλήθεια by the “Presbyter” and by Papias may, of course, be an accidental coincidence, but it is not without significance in the light of Eusebius’ statement, which we have not the slightest reason for discrediting. The First Epistle, if not the two smaller letters, must have been known and valued during the first quarter of the second century. The evidence does not amount to actual proof, as it is, of course, impossible to distinguish between personal acquaintance with the author and his teaching, and knowledge of the actual text of the Epistles. The evidence does not exclude the possibility of such teaching being embodied in Epistles at a later date. But there can be little doubt as to which hypothesis is the simpler and the more natural.

I iv. 18. οὐ τετελείωται εἰς τῇ ἀγάπῃ.

τετελείωσαι εἰς τῇ ἀγάπῃ may be a reminiscence of the language, as it certainly recalls the thought, of the Epistle.

I ii. 27. τὸ αὐτὸ χρισμα—ἀλήθεια εἰς παντὶ ρήματι, καὶ οὐδὲν παρ᾽ αὐτῷ ψεῦδος.

Hermeras, M. iii. 1. οὗτος ἡ ἁγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ ἐν ἡμῖν, ὅτι τὸν θεὸν ἀπέσταλεν ὁ θεὸς εἰς τὸν κόσμον (cf. Jn. 111. 16, 17).

The coincidence of language may possibly suggest a connection between the two passages, but it certainly does not prove it.

Ep. to Diognetos, xi. 14. οὕτως (cf. § 3, οὗ χάριν ἀπέστειλε Λόγου) ὁ ἀπ’ ἀρχῆς ὁ καινὸς φανεῖς καὶ παλαιὸς εὐφέρεις.

I i. 1. δὴ ἢν ἀπ’ ἀρχῆς.

3. ἐπιγνοῦν δὲ τίς φέρεις πληροβήσεθαι χαρᾶς ἡ πῶς ἀγαπήσης τὸν οὕτως προαγαπήσατα σε; I i. 9. εἰς τούτων ἐφανερώθη ἡ ἁγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ εἰς ἡμᾶς, ὅτι τῶν ἰδίων αὐτοῦ τῶν κόσμων ἀπέσταλκεν ὁ θεὸς εἰς τὸν κόσμον (cf. Jn. iii. 16, 17).
The echoes of Johannine thought are obvious, and on the whole the similarity is greater with the Epistle than with the Gospel.

Ep. Lugd. et Vienne. (Eus. v. i. I iii. 16. 'Εν τούτῳ ἐγνώκαμεν τὴν τὸν παράκλητον ἐν ἀγάπην, ὅτι ἐκεῖνος ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν τὴν ζητεῖ καὶ ἡμῖν τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ Ζαχαρίου, ὃ διὰ ψυχῆς ἐθήκεν: καὶ ἡμεῖς τὸ πληρώματος τῆς ἀγάπης ἐνεδείξατο, ὀφείλομεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν εὐδοκίας ἐν τῇ ἐνεκέχεισε καὶ τὴν ἑαυτῷ βείαν ἐνεδείξατο, ἔχων δὲ τὸν παράκλητον ἐν ἀγάπην, ὅτι ἐκεῖνος ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν τὴν ἑαυτῷ, τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ Ζαχαρίου, ὃ διὰ ψυχῆς ἐθήκεν: καὶ ἡμεῖς τὸ πληρώματος τῆς ἀγάπης ἐνεδείξατο, ὀφείλομεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν εὐδοκίας ἐνεκέχεισε. ἦν γὰρ καὶ ἐστὶν γρήγορος ἔγερσας ἐν ψυχῆς τοῦ πληρώματος τῆς ἐνεκέχεισας ἐν τῇ ἐνεκέχεισε καὶ τὴν ἑαυτῷ βείαν ἐνεδείξατο, ὀφείλομεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν εὐδοκίας ἐνεκέχεισας. ἦν γὰρ καὶ ἐστὶν γρήγορος ἔγερσας ἐν ψυχῆς τοῦ πληρώματος τῆς ἐνεκέχεισας ἐν τῇ ἐνεκέχεισε καὶ τὴν ἑαυτῷ βείαν ἐνεδείξατο, ὀφείλομεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν εὐδοκίας ἐνεκέχεισας. ἦν γὰρ καὶ ἐστὶν γρήγορος ἔγερσας ἐν ψυχῆς τοῦ πληρώματος τῆς ἐνεκέχεισας ἐν τῇ ἐνεκέχεισε καὶ τὴν ἑαυτῷ βείαν ἐνεδείξατο, ὀφείλομεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν εὐδοκίας ἐνεκέχεισας. ἦν γὰρ καὶ ἐστὶν γρήγορος ἔγερσας ἐν ψυχῆς τοῦ πληρώματος τῆς ἐνεκέχεισας ἐν τῇ ἐνεκέχεισε καὶ τὴν ἑαυτῷ βείαν ἐνεδείξατο, ὀφείλομεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν εὐδοκίας ἐνεκέχεισας. ἦν γὰρ καὶ ἐστὶν γρήγορος ἔγερσας ἐν ψυχῆς τοῦ πληρώματος τῆς ἐνεκέχεισας ἐν τῇ ἐνεκέχεισε καὶ τὴν ἑαυτῷ βείαν ἐνεδείξατο, ὀφείλομεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν εὐδοκίας ἐνεκέχεισας. ἦν γὰρ καὶ ἐστὶν γρήγορος ἔγερσας ἐν ψυχῆς τοῦ πληρώματος τῆς ἐνεκέχεισας ἐν τῇ ἐνεκέχεισε καὶ τὴν ἑαυτῷ βείαν ἐνεδείξατο, ὀφείλομεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν εὐδοκίας ἐνεκέχεισας. ἦν γὰρ καὶ ἐστὶν γρήγορος ἔγερσας ἐν ψυχῆς τοῦ πληρώματος τῆς ἐνεκέχεισας ἐν τῇ ἐνεκέχεισε καὶ τὴν ἑαυτῷ βείαν ἐνεδείξατο, ὀφείλομεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν εὐδοκίας ἐνεκέχεισας. ἦν γὰρ καὶ ἐστὶν γρήγορος ἔγερσας ἐν ψυχῆς τοῦ πληρώματος τῆς ἐνεκέχεισας ἐν τῇ ἐνεκέχεισε καὶ τὴν ἑαυτῷ βείαν ἐνεδείξατο, ὀφείλομεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν εὐδοκίας ἐνεκέχεισας. ἦν γὰρ καὶ ἐστὶν γρήγορος ἔγερσας ἐν ψυχῆς τοῦ πληρώματος τῆς ἐνεκέχεισας ἐν τῇ ἐνεκέχεισε καὶ τὴν ἑαυτῷ βείαν ἐνεδείξατο, ὀφείλομεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν εὐδοκίας ἐνεκέχεισας. ἦν γὰρ καὶ ἐστὶν γρήγορος ἔγερσας ἐν ψυχῆς τοῦ πληρώματος τῆς ἐνεκέχεισας ἐν τῇ ἐνεκέχεισε καὶ τὴν ἑαυτῷ βείαν ἐνεδείξατο, ὀφείλομεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν εὐδοκίας ἐνεκέχεισας. ἦν γὰρ καὶ ἐστὶν γρήγορος ἔγερσας ἐν ψυχῆς τοῦ πληρώματος τῆς ἐνεκέχεισας ἐν τῇ ἐνεκέχεισε καὶ τὴν ἑαυτῷ βείαν ἐνεδείξατο, ὀφείλομεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν εὐδοκίας ἐνεκέχεισας. ἦν γὰρ καὶ ἐστὶν γρήγορος ἔγερσας ἐν ψυχῆς τοῦ πληρώματος τῆς ἐνεκέχεισας ἐν τῇ ἐνεκέχεισε καὶ τὴν ἑαυτUPPORTED TEXT... first two Epistles of S. John were known and used before the third gained as wide a circulation.

Clem. Alex. Str. ii. 15. 66. Φαίνεται δὲ καὶ Ἰωάννης ἐν τῇ μείζονι ἐπιστολῇ τὰς διαφορὰς τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἐκδιδάσκων ἐν τούτοις: 'Εὰν τις ἴδῃ τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ ἁμαρτάνοντα ἁμαρτίαν μὴ πρὸς θάνατον, αἰτήσει, καὶ δώσει αὐτῷ ζωήν, τοὺς ἁμαρτάνοντος μὴ πρὸς θάνατον ἐπεν' 'Ἐστι γὰρ ἁμαρτία πρὸς θάνατον ὁ περὶ ἑκείνης λέγει, ἐὰν ἑρωτήσῃ τις. πάσα αὐτίκα ἁμαρτία ἐστὶ, καὶ ἐστὶν ἁμαρτία μὴ πρὸς θάνατον (1 Jn. v. 16 f.).

Ib. Str. iii. 4. 32. καὶ 'Εὰν ἑκατέροις φησίν ο Ἰωάννης ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ, ότι κοινωνίαν ἔχομεν μετ' αὐτοῦ, τούτα εἰπεῖ οὐκ θείον καὶ τὸ πάντα ἐν αὐτῷ λόγῳ διδάσκειν, ὑπενδύθηνε τιναν καὶ οὐ ποιοῦμεν τὴν ἀληθείαν, ἐὰν δὲ εἴη τῷ φωτί περιπατῶμεν ὡς αὐτὸς ἐν τῷ φωτί, κοινωνίαν ἔχομεν μετ' αὐτοῦ καὶ τὸ αἷμα Ἰησοῦ τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ καθαρίζει ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας (1 Jn. i. 6 f.).

Ib. Str. iii. 5. 42. καὶ πᾶς ὁ ἐκεῖν ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ κοινωνίαν, καὶ τὰς ἐντολὰς αὐτοῦ μὴ πρὸς θάνατον ἐπεν. Φόβος οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν τῷ κυρίῳ ἠμῶν, ἐὰν ἓδη ἤφαντο καὶ ἀγαθόν ἔχομεν δρᾶν ἐστίν. Ο μὴ ἀγαπῶν μηδὲ ἀληθείᾳ ἐκεῖνος ἀγνὸς ἔστιν.

Ib. Str. iii. 6. 45. πρῶτον μὲν τὸ τοῦ ἀποστόλου Ἰωάννου. Καί καὶ νῦν ἀντιχριστοὶ πολλοὶ γεγόνασιν, ὅτι οὐκ ἔχουμεν τῆς ἁμαρτίας ὁ περὶ τοῦ φῶτος, ἐὰν τοῦτο ψευδάμεθα καὶ οὐ ποιοῦμεν τὴν ἀληθείαν ἐν τῷ φῶτω, κοινωνίαν ἔχομεν μετ' αὐτοῦ καὶ τὸ αἷμα Ἰησοῦ τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ καθαρίζει ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας (1 Jn. v. 8). Μηδὲ ἀγαπῶμεν λόγῳ μηδὲ γλώσσῃ ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ ἠμῶν ἐστίν ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ (1 Jn. iv. 16).

Clement makes full use of the First Epistle, and recognizes at least two. The question whether he commented on all three Epistles, or on two only, in his Adumbrations, is discussed subsequently.
§ 6.

LITERARY HISTORY

Muratorian Fragment.

"Quid ergo mirum si Ioannes tam constanter singula etiam in epistulis suis proferat, dicens in semetipsum 'quae uidimus oculis nostris et auribus audiuiimus et manus nostrae palpauerunt, haec scripsimus uobis.' Sic enim non solum uisorem se et auditorem, sed et scriptorem omnium mirabilium domini per ordinem profitetur.

"Epistola sane Judae et superscriptae 2 Iohannis duae in catholica habentur et Sapientia ab amiciis Salomonis in honorem ipsius scripta."

The text is taken from Dr. Zahn’s Grundriss d. Geschichte d. NT. Kanons, p. 78. It is not necessary here to go over again the controversy raised by the different interpretations of these two passages in the Muratorianum which have been maintained by competent scholars. There can be no doubt that the (Greek) author of the document regarded the Epistles as the work of John the Apostle. But there is nothing to suggest that the Church for which he speaks (? Rome) accepted as Scripture more than two Johannine Epistles. Students can only feel astonishment at such statements as that of Dr. Gregory (Canon and Text of the New Testament, p. 132), “The way in which these two small Epistles of John are named seems odd,” which assumes a reference to the two shorter letters in the second paragraph quoted, without further discussion. This will be more fully discussed later on in connection with the other evidence for the circulation of only two Johannine Epistles.

Origen, In Ioann. v. 3 (ex Euseb. H. E. vi. 25), Τί δεῖ περὶ τοῦ ἀναπεσόντος ἐπὶ τὸ στῆθος λέγειν τοῦ ᾿Ιησοῦ, Ἰωάννου, ὃς εὐαγγέλιον ἔν καταλέλοιπεν, ὁμολογῶν δύνασθαι τοσαῦτα ποιήσειν, δι’ οὗ δὲ κύσιμος κρυφὴς ἐδύνατο; ἔγραψε δὲ καὶ τὴν ᾿Αποκάλυψιν, κελευσθεὶς σιωπῆσαι καὶ μὴ γράψαι τὰς τῶν ἕπτα βροντῶν φωνάς, καὶ ἐπιστολήν πάνω ὀλίγων στίχων, ἐστὼ δὲ καὶ δευτέρα καὶ τρίτην, ἔπει οὔ πάντες φασί γνησίους εἶναι ταύτας, πλὴν οὐκ εἰσὶ στίχων ἀμφότεραι ἐκατόν.

Origen makes very full use of the First Epistle. There are no quotations or “echoes” of the smaller Epistles. At least none are recorded in Lommatzsch’s indices, or in the volumes at present published in the Berlin Corpus. We do not know the original Greek of the passage in the VIIth Homily on Joshua (§ 1) which Rufinus translated, “Addit nihilominus adhuc et Ioannes tuba canere per epistolas” (Lomm. xi. 63).

Tertullian’s use of the First Epistle is full. He frequently

1 Sed et MS (acc. to Zahn the et is a later addition).
2 Su verscrictio Iohannes duas (uetypegrapemene).
quotes it by name. It is unnecessary to quote the passages here in full. Their evidence has been used in the Appendix on the Latin text of the Epistle. His use of the Second Epistle is doubtful, and there is no trace of the Third in his writings.

The evidence which has been quoted above shows that the date of the Johannine Epistles cannot reasonably be placed later than the first decade of the second century. The first Epistle was known and valued by the generation of Papias and Polycarp, and it was not only towards the close of their lives that they became acquainted with it. So far as their origin is concerned, it is difficult to separate the two shorter Epistles from the First. They bear on their face marks of genuineness which can hardly be seriously questioned. They deal practically with questions, about the limits within which hospitality should be shown to travelling teachers, which are known to have been matters of controversy in the first half of the second century, and which probably often called for solution some considerable time before that. It is almost inconceivable that any one should have written them “to do honour” to some “great light” of earlier times, or to the Apostle himself, as the Asiatic Presbyter, of whom Tertullian tells us, tried to do honour to S. Paul by writing the Acta Pauli, or as the “friends” of Solomon, perhaps Philo himself, in the view of the author of the Muratorian Fragment, thought to honour the Jewish king. No one would have created for the glorification of an Apostle, or even a Presbyter, the very dubious situation of disputed authority which the Third Epistle reveals. Even if his object had been rather to gain Apostolic or early authority for particular methods of treating strangers, he could hardly have done his work so badly as such a theory would imply. The reasons for preferring at a later date the view whichattributes the authorship to an Elder as opposed to the “Apostolic” author of the First Epistle, are obvious. It is almost impossible to find any serious reason to explain their survival except the authority and reputation of their real author, whoever he may have been. They go with the First Epistle; and in view of their contents, their preservation, and the traditions attached to them, we are fully justified in attributing their authorship to the Elder, who doubtless “lived on till the time of Trajan,” and whose authority and reputation in the province of Asia stood so high throughout the second century.

The history of the reception of the three Epistles into the Canon of the New Testament is more difficult to trace. There is no doubt that the First Epistle was generally accepted before the close of the second century. The only certain exception is the Canon of Edessa, where we know from the Doctrine of Addai that as late as the fourth century (? fifth) the statement that no books should be accepted as Scripture, to be read in church, except the Gospel (i.e. the Diatessaron), the Acts, and the Epistles of Paul, was retained without comment in the legendary account of the origins of Christianity in that quarter. The same Canon is found in the Syrian Canon (? c. 400 A.D.), found in Cod. Syr. 20 (saec. ix.) of the convent of S. Catharine on Mt. Sinai¹ (A. S. Lewis, London, 1894). The chief evidence for the acceptance of only one Epistle is as follows. (1) Eusebius' knowledge of the use and acceptance of the Epistles in early times led him to place only the First Epistle among the ὁμολογούμενα, the two smaller Epistles being placed among the ἀντιλεγόμενα, γνώριμα τοῖς πολλοῖς, with the added caution, "whether they be by the Evangelist, or by another of the same name."² (2) The statement by Origen, quoted above, that the authorship of the two smaller Epistles is disputed, and the fact that he does not seem to have quoted them, which in his case is perhaps significant. (3) The Canon of the Peshitta, in which only three Catholic Epistles find a place, a Canon which is frequently found in the East. But the acceptance of the "seven-letter" Canon must be dealt with later on. (4) The protest of the scribe of the Cheltenham list (Mommsen's Canon? 360 A.D.), or of his predecessor, who has added after the mention of the three Johannine Epistles the words "una sola," as after that of the two Petrine Epistles.³ On the other hand, we have earlier evidence of the use of 2 John as authoritative in Africa. (5) In the attribution of the two smaller Epistles to the "Elder," in the Roman list of 382 (cf. JTS, 1900, i. 554-560), where the influence of Jerome is clearly to be seen, "Iohannis apostoli epistula una alterius Iohannis presbyteri epistulae duae."

The evidence for the acceptance of the first two Epistles without the third is less clear, and not very easy to interpret. But it is sufficiently definite and widespread to deserve serious consideration. (1) We have seen how Irenaeus confuses the two Epistles. There is no trace of the use of the Third Epistle in his writings. (2) We have evidence of the use of the first two Epistles in Africa in Cyprian's time. He himself frequently quotes the First Epistle, and the quotation of 2 Jn. 10, 11 by Aurelius a Chullabi (Sententiae Episcoporum, 81, p. 459, ed. Hartel) vindicates for it a place in the African, at least in the Carthaginian, Bible of that period. Again we find no trace of the Third Epistle. (3) The usage of Gaul and Africa is supported by that of Rome. There can be little doubt as to what is the natural interpretation of the language used by the author of the Muratorian Fragment. When he is dealing with the Gospels, and feels himself obliged to defend the Fourth Gospel against attacks which clearly had been made on it, probably by Caius, he quotes the Epistle in support of his view that the Fourth Gospel was the work of an eye-witness of the ministry, to prove that the author plainly declares himself not only a witness, but also a hearer and recorder of all the wonders of the Lord in order. When he comes to that in the Epistles, he makes the plain statement that in his Church two Epistles of John are received. There is nothing to suggest that he excludes the First, which he has already quoted elsewhere, or that he is dealing now only with doubtful books. Dr. Zahn's argument on this point would seem to prove too much, for it involves the consequence that the only books which the Roman Church at that time treated as undoubted Scripture were those contained in the restricted Canon of Edessa, Gospel(s), Acts, Pauline Epistles. (4) The fact that the Latin epitome by Cassiodorus, and Clement's Adumbrationes on the Catholic Epistles, contain notes on the first two Epistles of S. John only, is significant. The evidence of Eusebius, who states that Clement commented on all the (seven) Catholic Epistles, as well as on Barnabas and the Petrine Apocalypse, which is supported by Photius, must be set against this. But the suspicion is at least well grounded that the general statement of Eusebius may be loose. On the other hand, no stress can be laid on Clement's use (see above, p. lvi) of the phrase ἐν τῇ μείζονι ἐπιστολῇ. It is equally compatible with his recognition of three Epistles or of two. And later writers who undoubtedly accepted all seven Catholic Epistles frequently quote the First Epistles of Peter and John as “the Epistle” of those writers.

¹ All three Epistles are, of course, absent from the Canon of Marcion.
² Euseb. H. E. iii. 25.
³ Epistulae Iohannis III ūr CCCL una sola (Zahn, Grundriss, p. 81).

It is difficult to estimate the exact bearing of this evidence; but in view of its distribution, and the definite character of some of it, we can hardly neglect it. It is quite natural that, even where it was fully accepted, the Third Epistle should have left hardly any trace of its existence. There is scarcely a phrase in it, not found in the other Epistles, which we should expect to find quoted. But such as it is, the evidence points to a period when only two Johannine Epistles were generally accepted in the West, and perhaps at Alexandria, a Church which is frequently found in agreement with the West rather than the East, in matters connected with the Canon as well as in matters of greater importance. The Second Epistle would seem to have come into circulation more rapidly than the Third. The evidence does not, at any rate, justify the usual treatment of the two shorter letters as a pair of inseparable twins. With the possible exception of one phrase (ἀπ᾿ αὐτῆς τῆς ἀληθείας) in Papias’ quotation, or summary, of the words of the Presbyter, we find no certain trace of language of the Third Epistle till the time of Augustine and Jerome. It was known to Origen, whose influence on Eusebius is perhaps most clearly seen in his treatment of the books which form the first section of his “Antilegomena.” It is possible that his predecessor Clement treated it as Scripture. But it seems to have been very little used. It is quoted by Augustine and Jerome, and formed part of the Bible out of which Augustine selected his “Speculum,” which must, of course, be clearly distinguished from the Liber de Divinis Scripturis, generally known as ‘m,’ in which there is no quotation from the Third Epistle. The text found in the Speculum is, of course, Vulgate, whether that text goes back to S. Augustine himself, as Professor Burkitt supposes (JTS xi. 263 ff., 1910), or is due to subsequent alteration. Sabatier’s attempt to reproduce fragments of an old Latin translation of the Third Epistle from the quotations in Augustine and Jerome, shows that it probably existed in an old Latin pre-Vulgate text,—a fact which is placed beyond doubt by the fragment contained in the Latin of Codex Bezae.

1 Geschichte des NT. Kanons, pp. 213–220.
§ 6.] LITERARY HISTORY

The history of the smaller Epistles is closely connected with that of the substitution of the seven-letter Canon of Catholic Epistles for the three-letter Canon of the East, and of which a short sketch must now be given.

In the East the Epistle of James, which Origen certainly treated as Scripture in some sense, though not without recording the doubts which were felt about it, was soon added to the generally recognized Epistles, 1 Peter and 1 John. These three letters form the Canon of Catholic Epistles in the Peshitta. And this three-letter Canon is found in all the provinces which were under the influence of Antioch. Chrysostom, who was moved from Antioch to Constantinople in 398, knows and uses no other Catholic Epistles. The same Canon is found in the Cappadocian Fathers, Basil, Gregory of Nazianzum, and Gregory of Nyssa in the last quarter of the fourth century. According to Lietzmann, the same can be proved to have been the usage of Methodius of Olympus about 300 A.D. During the fourth century the process of replacing this shorter Canon by the fuller seven-letter Canon was begun and in most places carried through. It is fully recognized by Eusebius in several places, and his formal list, in which the five Epistles, James, Jude, 2, 3 John,
Peter are separated off from the rest of the Antilegomena, suggests that it is the Canon which he himself preferred. In this he was no doubt influenced by the statements of Origen about these letters. In 367, Athanasius put it forward in his thirty-ninth Festal Letter as the official list of Egypt. It is, however, found still earlier in Cyril of Jerusalem (340). The fact that the letters always are found in the same order, wherever this Canon is used in the East, suggests that here its adoption was a matter of definite policy, due probably to the necessity for uniformity felt by the Nicenes in their struggle with the influence of the Court. The varying orders found in the West point to a more natural and gradual process of adoption. It may be noticed that Gregory of Nazianzum names all seven Epistles in his list of the Canon, but his own practice seems to have been to quote only those found in the shorter Canon. Both the three- and the seven-letter Canons are mentioned in the list of Amphilochius of Iconium in Lycaonia. In the Island of Cyprus, Epiphanius is a supporter of the seven-letter Canon. On the other hand, Theodoret of Cyrus (430-450) apparently uses in his writings only the three letters. In the Syriac Bible the seven Epistles appear first in the recension of Philoxenus of Mabug (500).

Enough has been said of the history of the reception of the Johannine letters in the West. The acceptance of the Athanasian Canon, which contained the three letters of S. John, and its final supremacy in the West, were due to the influence of Augustine and Jerome. As we see from the Canon Mommsenianus, it did not pass without protest.

Thus the literary history of the letters shows that the assignment of an early date to the two shorter letters, especially to the Third, depends on the internal evidence of their character and content rather than on external attestation. Their final acceptance was undoubtedly due to the belief of the men of the fourth century, and in part of the third, in their Apostolic origin. During the earlier period of their obscurity they would hardly have been preserved but for the respect felt for their author. Internal evidence is practically decisive against the hypothesis of forgery. The question of their authorship is part of the wider problem, which still awaits a satisfactory solution, of the authorship and date of the "Ephesian Canonical Writings" and of the personality of the Ephesian "Elder."

§ 7. The Text.

The following list gives most of the older and more important manuscripts and authorities for the text of the Epistles:
§ 7. THE TEXT

C. δι. Codex Sinaiticus. Petersburg (iv.).

δι. Codex Ephraimi. Paris. Bibl. Nat. 9 (v.); 1 Jn. i. 1 τους—(2) εσπα[κομεν], iv. 2 εστιν—(3 Jn. 2) ψυχη.

ψ. δι. Athos. Lawra 172 (β52) (viii.—ix.).

389. α74. Patmos. Ιωαννου 16 (x.).

Apl. 261. α7. Sinai 273 (ix.).

S. α2. Athos. Lawra 88 (a88) (viii.—ix.).

384. α54. Chalki. Ευπόριθος. Σχολη 26 (x.).

9. α189. Cambridge Univ. Libr. Kk. vi. 4 (xi.—xii). See Westcott, p. 91, who gives a list of the interesting readings contained in this MS. It is not included in von Soden’s list of the manuscripts of which he used collations for the text of the Catholic Epistles.

Old Latin Version.

h. Fleury Palimpsest, ed. S. Berger, Paris, 1889, and Buchanan, Old Latin Biblical Texts, Oxford (v.). 1 Jn. i. 8—iii. 20.

q. Ziegler, Itala Fragmente. Marburg, 1876. 1 Jn. iii. 8—v. 21.

m. Liber de divinis Scripturis sive Speculum, ed. Wehrich. Vienna Corpus xii., 1887. The following verses are quoted: 1 Jn. i. 2, 3, 8, 9, ii. 9, 10, 21, 23, iii. 7—10, 16—18, iv. 1, 9, 15, 18, v. 1, 6—8, 10, 20, 21; 2 Jn. 7, 10, 11.

Augustine’s Tractatus. 1 Jn. i. 1—v. 12.

Egyptian Versions.

These Epistles do not offer many problems of special difficulty or interest so far as the determination of the true text is concerned. A comparison of the texts published by Westcott and Hort with Nestle's text, shows how few instances there are in which serious doubt exists. The chief interest of the textual problems which they present lies in the history of the glosses which have been inserted into their text, and a few paraphrases which have been substituted for the true texts. The most famous of these glosses, the addition of the "Heavenly Witnesses," does not stand by itself. The tendency to gloss is most marked in Latin authorities, but it can be traced in the Egyptian and other versions, and cursive Greek manuscripts offer a few instances of its presence in Greek. An attempt has been made to collect the evidence for the Old Latin text of the Epistle in an Appendix. The critical notes which have been added to each verse are based on Tischendorf's eighth edition, supplemented where possible from later sources of information. For the Egyptian Versions (Bohairic and Sahidic), fresh collations have been made, and also for the Armenian. Tischendorf's information has been reproduced, as it stands in his edition, where it appears to be correct. Corrections and additions are given under the symbols boh, sah, arm. The heavier type should make it possible to see at a glance the extent to which Tischendorf's information has been supplemented or modified.

The attempt has also been made to extract from von Soden's Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments, i. ii. C, the variants in the text of these Epistles which are to be found in Greek MSS, quoted by him, but which are not contained in Tischendorf's critical apparatus. The number of instances in which it has been necessary to add a note of interrogation may form some indication of the difficulty of using von Soden's book for this purpose. It is much to be hoped that the stores of interesting information as to the readings of Greek MSS, especially min-uscules, which are contained in his great work, may be published in some form which would render them available for general use. In the citation of these readings von Soden's system of notation has been reproduced, so that the new material is easily distinguishable. At the end of each group of MSS quoted, the number which the first MS in the group bears in Gregory's list has been added in brackets. In the case of δ MSS (i.e. those which contain the Gospels as well as the Acts and Catholic Epistles, etc.), Gregory's Gospel number has been given. It may be noticed that several of the readings of δ6 (Ψ) are of considerable interest. As the Latin text has been dealt with in an appendix, no attempt has been made to revise Tischendorf's presentation of its evidence.

It may be worth while to give some account of von Soden's assignment of variants to his different groups.

For the I–H–K text he claims the following readings:

I Jn. 1. 4. ημεῖς (ημιν, C K a σ).
ii. 19. εξ ημων ησαν (ησαν εξ ημων).
iii. 2. om. δε (after οιδαμεν) (habet K L a σ).
iii. 14. om. τον αδελφον (after ο μη αγαπων) (habet C K a σ).
iv. 12. τετελειωμενη εστιν εν ημιν (τετ. εν ημιν εστιν).
v. 10. εαυτω (αυτω).
v. 20. και οιδαμεν, Α a (οιδαμεν δε: om. και).
2 Jn. 5. καινη γραφων σοι (γραφων σοι καινη) (habet C K a σ).

The following cases he regards as uncertain:

I Jn. ii. 10. εν αυτω ουκ εστιν (ουκ εστιν εν αυτω, Wmg).
iii. 23. εντολην + ημιν (om. K L a σ).
2 Jn. 12. ημων (ημων, Wmg).
3 Jn. 9. εγραψα + η (om. η, K L a σ: αν, 13 a).

H. Uncertain:

I Jn. iii. 5. om. ημων after αμαρτιας (habet ημων, Ν C a σ).
iii. 7. (?) παιδια, Wmg (τεκνια).
iii. 19. την καρδιαν (τας καρδιας).
2 Jn. 9. προαγων (παραβαινων).

"Sonderlesarten":

I Jn. ii. 18. om. ο before αντιχριστος (habet ο, A K L a σ).

I. Variants due to reminiscences of other passages:

I Jn. i. 4. ημων, Wmg 1 (ημων). Cf. Jn. xv. 11.

1 i.e. the margin of Westcott and Hort's edition.
Doubtful cases of a similar kind:

1 Jn. i. 5. \~\(\text{\vota}\ \text{\vota}\) estin. Cf. Jn. i. 19.
   \(\text{\vota}\ \text{\vota}\) (\(\text{\vota}\ \text{\vota}\)). Cf. ii. 25.
   ii. 27. \(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\) (\(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\)). Cf. ver. 24.
   ii. 28. \(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\) (\(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\)). Cf. iii. 21, iv. 17.
   iii. 11. \(\text{\vota}\ \text{\vota}\) (\(\text{\vota}\ \text{\vota}\)). Cf. ii. 25.
   iii. 15. \(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\) (\(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\)). Cf. ver. 9.
   v. 20. \(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\) + \(\theta\). Cf. Jn. xvii. 3.
   \(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\). Cf. i. 2, ii. 25; Jn. xiv. 6.

Doubtful cases of other kinds:

1 Jn. i. 9. \(\kappa\beta\alpha\rho\alpha\rho\iota\sigma\tau\iota\ (\sigma\eta).\)
   ii. 6. om. \(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\).
   \~\(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\) \(\kappa\alpha\iota\ \text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\).
   iv. 3. om. \(\epsilon\kappa.
   v. 16. \(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\) + \(\tau\). Cf. Jn. ii. 25.
   v. 21. \(\epsilon\alpha\\nu\tau\sigma\upsilon\ (\epsilon\alpha\upsilon).\)

2 Jn. 3. \(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\) (\(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\)).
   \(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\) (\(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\)).

"Sonderlesarten":

1 Jn. i. 3. om. \(\delta\).
   ii. 8. \(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\) (\(\text{\omicron}\ \text{\omicron}\)).
   ii. 26. \(\pi\lambda\alpha\nu\upsilon\tau\omicron\).
   ii. 29. \(\iota\delta\eta\tau\epsilon\ (\epsilon\iota\delta\epsilon\tau).\) \(\gamma\epsilon\epsilon\nu\eta\tau\iota\).
   iii. 17. \(\theta\epsilon\omega\rho\epsilon\ (\rho\eta).\)
THE TEXT

§ 7.

1 Jn. iii. 19. πεισωμεν.
iv. 20. μισει (-ησ).

2 Jn. 6. om. ὑμα, 2ο.
11. om. αυτω.
12. ηβουληθην.

3 Jn. 4. ταυτης (τουτων).
8. γενωμεθα (γεν-).
9. εγραψα) + av.
10. om. εκ.
11. ο, 2ο) + δε.

Κ. Uncertain:
1 Jn. iii. 15. αυτω (εαυτω, Wmg).
iiiiii. 17. θεωρει (-η).
v. 20. γινωσκωμεν.

Κ'. 1 Jn. iii. 1. om. και εσμεν.
iii. 18. om. εν.
iii. 19. πεισωμεν.
iv. 16. om. μενει (2ο).
v. 20. μισει.

v. 4. ημων.
v. 10. εαυτω.
v. 11. ~ο θεος ημων.
v. 20. γινωσκομεν.
v. 21. εαυτους.
3 Jn. 8. γενωμεθα,
10. om. εκ.

"Sonderlesarten" Κ': 1 Jn. ii. 24. ~πατρι . . . νυω.
iii. 24. om. και (3ο).

2 Jn. 5. εχομεν.
9. ο (2ο) + δε.

Κc. 2 Jn. 8. απολεσητε . . . ειργασασθε . . . απολαβητε (1 Jn. iii. 15. αυτω.
iii. 17. θεωρει. Cf. i.) 1 Jn. iii. 10. δικαιοσυνην] for την.
iii. 18. om. εν.
iv. 16. om. μενει (2ο).

Κ. "Sonderlesarten":
1 Jn. i. 3. om. και (2ο).
i. 7. Ιν] + Χυ.
ii. 4. om. στι.
ii. 7. αδελφοι (αγαπητοι).
ηκουσατε) + απ αρχης.

f
I Jn. ii. 13. γραφω (εγραψα).
   ii. 24. γειεσ + ουν.
   ii. 27. εν ευν μενει.
        αυτο (αυτου).
        μενετε (μενετε).
   ii. 28. οταν (εαν).
   ii. 29. ομ. και (Wm).
   iii. 1. ημας (ημασ).
   iii. 13. ομ. και.
        αδελφοι + μου.
   iii. 16. θεναι (θεναι).
   iii. 18. τεκνια + μου.
   iii. 19. γυνωσκομεν (γυνωσομεθα).
   iii. 21. καρδια] + ημων.
   iii. 22. παρ (απ).
   iv. 3. ομ. τον.
        Ἰησουν + Xv.
        + Xv en σαρκι εληλυθοτα.
   iv. 19. αγαπωμεν + αυτον.
   iv. 20. πως (ου).
   v. 2. τηρομεν (ποιομεν).
   v. 4. ημων.
   v. 5. ομ. δε.
   v. 6. ομ. και πνευματος.
   v. 9. ην (οτι).
   v. 13. ον εχετε.
        εχετε + και ινα πιστευητε.
        πιστευουσιν—θεου αντε ινα.
   v. 15. παρ (απ).

2 Jn. 3. Iησου] pr. κυ.
      6. εστιν η εντολη.
      7. ειςηλθον (εξηλθον).
      9. διδαχη (2ο) + του Xu.
      12. ελθειν (γενεσθαι).

3 Jn. 4. ομ. τη.
      7. εθνων (εθνικων).
      8. απολαμβανειν (υπ-).
      12. οιδατε (οιδας).
      13. γραφειν (γραψα).
          ομ. σοι.
          γραψαι (γραφειν).
"Sonderlesarten" of unknown origin:

1 Jn. ii. 23. \(\varepsilon\chi\varepsilon\iota\varepsilon\varepsilon\iota\) (i.e. om. \(\varepsilon\omega 2^{o}\) — \(\varepsilon\chi\varepsilon\varepsilon\iota 2^{o}\)).

iii. 1. om. καὶ εἰσιμέν.

2 Jn. 6. om. ἔνα (1°).

1 Jn. iv. 2. γινωσκεται.

2 Jn. 6. om. ἐνα (1°).

1 Jn. iv. 2. γινωσκεται.

Where it seemed necessary for the sake of clearness, the other variant or variants have been added in brackets. The readings adopted by Westcott and Hort and by Nestle have been underlined. If the agreement of these two authorities may be taken as affording a rough standard of what is probably the true text, it will be seen at once that the variants which von Soden claims for the I—H—K text, if we neglect differences in the order of words, are with one exception (καὶ οἰδαμεν for οἰδαμεν δε) those which have been accepted as part of the true text by the best critics. The same is, however, true of most of the small class of readings which he attributes, mostly with some expression of doubt, to the "H" text. Indeed, by the test of intrinsic probability, these readings stand as high as those claimed for the I—H—K text. It is difficult to believe, for instance, that προάγων (2 Jn. 9) is not the true text, softened down by later influences to παραβαινων. It is also difficult to suppose that the occurrence of the word in Mk. x. 32 (Jesus "going before" His disciples on the way to Jerusalem) had any influence on the Johannine text here. But von Soden's treatment of the "H" text may perhaps throw valuable light on the readings where the other authorities for the "H" text part company with 61-2 (B 8), a subject which needs further investigation. It is also interesting to notice how seldom the readings assigned to "I" or "K" have been accepted as original. The inclusion of the omission of καὶ πνευματος (1 Jn. v. 6) among the "Sonderlesarten" of K is interesting. Does this imply that the true text of the passage ran ο ἐλθων δὲ νεατος καὶ αιματος καὶ πνευματος, and that the words καὶ πνευματος were removed in the "K" recension because of the absence of corresponding words in the second half of the verse? On the whole, it would seem that we must wait for the publication of von Soden's Greek text before we can make much use of the information contained in his section on the text of the Catholic Epistles, except in so far as it supplies us with information about new readings not known before, or at least not recorded in the apparatus criticus of the ordinary editions.

It may, however, be worth while to append a list of the MSS which he assigns to his three Recensions, and which have been fully examined for the purposes of his great work. The symbols used by Tischendorf and Gregory are given below the von Soden numbers.

1. H Recension.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>δ1</th>
<th>δ2</th>
<th>δ3</th>
<th>δ4</th>
<th>δ6</th>
<th>δ48</th>
<th>-257</th>
<th>3</th>
<th>74</th>
<th>103</th>
<th>162</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>B</td>
<td>N</td>
<td>C</td>
<td>A</td>
<td>Ψ</td>
<td>33</td>
<td>(13AK) 33</td>
<td>P</td>
<td>389</td>
<td>38</td>
<td>25</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

2. I Recension.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Ια</th>
<th>70</th>
<th>-101</th>
<th>7</th>
<th>-264</th>
<th>200-382</th>
<th>δ505</th>
<th>252</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>505</td>
<td>40</td>
<td>Ap'l.</td>
<td>261</td>
<td>233</td>
<td>83</td>
<td>231</td>
<td>69</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

| -δ459 | δ203 | -δ300 | -552 |
| 489 | (195AK) 808 | (265AK) 218 | (65AK) 217 |

| δ454 | 170 | 175 | 192 | 502 | 397 | -205 | -106 |
| 794  | (262AK) 303 | 319 | 318 | 116 | 96  | 51  | 179 |

| -164 | -261 | 184 | 158 | δ157 | -δ507 |
| 56 | 64 | 65 | 1100 | -55 | δ254 | (? a254) | -110 |
| 316 | 328 | 317 | 310 | 236 | 26  | 332 |

| -δ457 | -δ500 | δ156 | 256 | 361 |
| 209 | (95AK) 205 | (93AK) 226 | (108AK) 24 | 248 |

| 113 | 110 |
| 235 | 332 |

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Ιβ</th>
<th>(α)</th>
<th>62</th>
<th>365</th>
<th>396</th>
<th>472</th>
<th>398</th>
<th>δ206</th>
<th>253</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>498</td>
<td>214</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>312</td>
<td>69</td>
<td>242</td>
<td>(105AK) 2</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

| (β) | 78 | -157 | 469 | δ370 |
| 29 | 215 | 1149 | (288AK) |

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Ιc</th>
<th>(α)</th>
<th>208</th>
<th>370</th>
<th>116</th>
<th>551</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>307</td>
<td>353</td>
<td>—</td>
<td>216</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

| (β) | 364 | -486 | 114 | -174 | 506 |
| 137 | — | 335 | 252 | 60 |

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>2</th>
<th>5</th>
<th>54</th>
<th>186</th>
<th>δ255</th>
<th>394</th>
<th>500</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>S</td>
<td>L</td>
<td>384</td>
<td>223</td>
<td>58</td>
<td>(35AK)</td>
<td>—</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

| Kc | 186 | δ255 |
| 223 | 57  | (35AK) |

| Kf | (used for 1 Jn. v. only). |
| 358 | 462 | δ463 |
| 38  | 169 | 656 | (213AK) |

1 In accordance with von Soden's usage, when a number is given without a preceding letter it belongs to the a group (Acts and Catholic Epistles, etc.).
The following list of Commentaries, Articles, and Books has been compiled more especially with reference to what has been used in the preparation of this edition. The fullest bibliographies are to be found in Holtzmann (Hand-Kommentar) and Luthardt (Strack-Zöckler).

Ancient Greek
- Oecumenius.
- Theophylact.
- Catena, ed. Cramer.

Latin
- Bede.

Modern
- Wettstein.
- Bengel.
- Lücke, 1820–1856.
  - Translation, The First Epistle of S. John. (Clark’s Foreign Theological Library, 1879.)
- Rothe, Der Erste Johannis Brief praktisch erklärt. 1878.
  - A most valuable Commentary.
  - Pulpit Commentary. 1889.
- Lias (Cambridge Bible for Schools). 1887.
- B. Weiss (Meyer, 6th edition, 1899). In the preparation of the notes of the present book the 5th edition (1888) was used.
- Luthardt (Strack-Zöckler Kurzgez. Kommentar, iv.). 1895.
Belser. 1906.
Holtzmann (Hand-Commentar zum NT. iv.). 1908 (besorgt von W. Bauer).
Windisch (Lietzmann's Handbuch zum NT. iv. 2). 1911.

Monographs and Articles:
Hilgenfeld, Das Evangelium und die Briefe Johannis nach ihrem Lehrbegriff dargestellt. 1849.
J. R. Harris, Expositor, 1901, p. 194 ff.
Salmond, article in Hastings' Bible Dictionary.
Expositor, June 1907. Correspondence between Drs. Westcott and Hort. The Divisions of the First Ep. of S. John.
§ 9. THE SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES. AUTHORSHIP.

The Second and Third Epistles of S. John naturally form a pair. They are almost exactly of the same length. Their length is probably determined by the size of an ordinary papyrus sheet (Zahn, Einl. ii. 581. Rendel Harris).

It is hardly necessary to discuss the question of their common authorship. The similarity between them is too close to admit of any explanation except common authorship or conscious imitation. It would tax the ingenuity of the most skilful separator to determine which is the original and which the copy. They probably do not deal with the same situation, though many writers have found a reference to the Second Epistle in the Third (ἔγραψά τι τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ). But the similarity of their style and the parallelism of their structure point clearly, not only to common authorship, but to nearness of date.

The following phrases show the close similarity of their general structure:

B’

ὁ πρεσβύτερος.
οὗτος ἐγὼ ἀγαπῶ ἐν ἀληθείᾳ.
ἐχάρην γὰρ λίαν... μαρτυροῦντων σου τῇ ἀληθείᾳ καθὼς σὺ ἐν ἀληθείᾳ περιπατεῖς.
ἵνα ἀκούω τὰ ἐμὰ τέκνα ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ περιπάτουντα.

Γ’

ὁ πρεσβύτερος.
δυν ἐγὼ ἀγαπῶ ἐν ἀληθείᾳ.
ἐχάρην γὰρ λίαν... μαρτυροῦντων σου τῇ ἀληθείᾳ καθὼς σὺ ἐν ἀληθείᾳ περιπατεῖς.
ἵνα ἀκούω τὰ ἐμὰ τέκνα ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ περιπάτουντα.

πολλὰ ἔχων ύμῖν γράφειν.
οὐκ ἐβουλήθην διὰ χάρτου καὶ μέλανος.
ἀλλὰ ἐπιτίμω γενέσαι πρὸς υἱόν ὑμῶν.
καὶ στόμα πρὸς στόμα λαλῆσαι.
ἀσπάζεται σε τὰ τέκνα τῆς ἀδελφῆς σου.

πολλὰ ἔχων γράψαι σοι.
ἀλλ’ οὐ θέλω διὰ μέλανος καὶ καλάμου σοι γράφειν.
ἐλπίζω δὲ ἵνα εὐθέως σε ἰδεῖν.
καὶ στόμα πρὸς στόμα λαλῆσομεν.
ἀσπάζονται σε οἱ φίλοι.
It may be a question how much of this should be referred to epistolary convention, and how much should be regarded as the sondergut of the writer. But the close resemblance, coupled with complete independence in the parts where circumstances and subject-matter naturally lead to diversity, can hardly be explained on any other theory except that the two letters are by the same hand.

A more serious question is raised when the two letters are compared with the First Epistle. Here there is a certain amount of evidence, both external and internal, which is not conclusive of difference of authorship, but at least needs serious consideration.

They have many phrases which recall, or are identical with, those of the First Epistle. We may notice the following:

\[\text{μένων ἐν τῇ διδαχῇ, 2 Jn. 9.}\]
\[\text{ἡ μαρτυρία ἡν ἔχει, 2 Jn. 9.}\]
\[\text{ἡ μαρτυρία ἡμῶν ἀληθής ἐστι, 3 Jn. 12.}\]
\[\text{ὁ λογὸς τοῦ θεοῦ ἐν ὑμῖν μένει, 1 Jn. ii. 14.}\]
\[\text{ἦν τῷ φωτὶ περιπατῶμεν, 1 Jn. i. 7.}\]
\[\text{πᾶς ὁ ἀρνοῦμεν ἄνος ὁ πατέρα καὶ τὸν υἱόν ἔχει, 1 Jn. ii. 22.}\]
\[\text{πᾶς ὁ ἀρνοῦμεν τὸν πατέρα καὶ τὸν υἱόν ἔχει, 1 Jn. ii. 22.}\]
\[\text{πᾶς ὁ ἀρνοῦμεν τὸν πατέρα καὶ τὸν υἱόν ἔχει, 1 Jn. ii. 22.}\]

We may also notice the thoroughly Johannine method of emphasizing an idea by parallel clauses, one positive and the other negative. Cf. 2 Jn. 9; 3 Jn. 11.
A careful comparison of these instances of words, phrases, and constructions which are common to the two smaller Epistles and the larger Epistle establishes beyond the possibility of doubt the intimate connection between the two. A knowledge of the First Epistle, or of its contents, seems almost necessarily presupposed in some passages of the smaller Epistles. Cf. especially 2 Jn. 9, 3 Jn. 11. 2 Jn. 12 need not contain an actual reference to 1 Jn. i. 4, but it gains in point if it is written in view of what is said there about the "fulfilment of joy." In the one case it is the written, in the other the spoken, word that is lacking to assure the fulness of joy which comes of fellowship. And it is interesting to notice the similarity of the results obtained by a comparison of 2 and 3 John with 1 John to those which appear when we compare the Gospel and the First Epistle. The connection is indisputable. We are compelled to choose between common authorship and conscious imitation. And the freedom with which the same and similar tools are handled points clearly to the former as the more probable alternative.

The internal evidence of different authorship on which Pfleiderer depends is not conclusive. He notices (1) the anonymous and general character of the First Epistle, as compared with the address of the Second to a particular Church, and the Third to an individual, named Caius, and the use of the title "The Presbyter" by the author in both. (2) The common identification of this "Presbyter" with John the Presbyter is supported by no valid reasons. There must have been many other "Presbyters," and those addressed would know who was meant, though it was not the famous "Presbyter" of Papias. We really know nothing of Papias' Presbyter except that he "handed down" a Chiliastic saying attributed to the Lord. Such an one was not likely to have busied himself with Gnostic theology and anti-Gnostic polemic. In his case the term "Elder" is used in the natural sense of the term; in these Epistles it is a title of office, used by one who claims respect for his official position, who dictates to the faithful as to the company they are to keep, gives letters of commendation to wandering preachers, and is offended at their being neglected. (3) The anti-Gnostic polemic of 2 John is the same as that of Polycarp, ad Phil. vii. 1, pure docetism, as found in Ignatius, and not the milder and later separation between Jesus and Christ.

Of these reasons some are pure assumptions, and others are fully accounted for by the (possible) differences of circumstance. There is nothing in the Epistles which necessitates an official use of the term "Elder," though one who is aged may be in a position to speak and act with authority. The authority which the author claims is far greater than ever attached to the office of "Presbyter."

The question of whether "pure Docetism" is earlier than "dualistic separation" of the kind attributed to Cerinthus is an open one. But where is the justification for differentiating between the Second and the First Epistles in this respect? The language of the Second is hardly intelligible without reference to the First. It may certainly be interpreted in the same sense.

The reasons brought forward by Jülicher (Einleitung, p. 218) are not more convincing. The expressions ἐχάρην λίαν, βλέπετε ἑαυτού (cf. I Jn. v. 21, φυλάξατε ἑαυτά), μισθὸν πλήρη ἀπολαμβάνειν, συνεργοὶ γινώμεθα, ἀγαθοποιεῖν, do not prove much. The use of the singular only of Antichrist is equally unconvincing, especially in view of I Jn. ii. 22. The difference between ἐληλυθότα and ἐρχόμενον is at least less striking than the resemblance of the rest of the passages. The apparent contradiction between 3 Jn. 11, ὃ κακοποιῶν οὐχ ἑώρακεν τὸν θεόν, and Jn. i. 18, 1 Jn. iv. 12, could easily be paralleled by similar "contradictions" in the Gospel (cf. also Jn. xiv. 9).

Both writers also lay stress on the external evidence. That the two smaller Epistles found their way into the Canon apart from the First is partly true. There is, however, considerable evidence for the acceptance of two Johannine Epistles, i.e. 1, 2 Jn., before the three were generally recognized. And the private character of the smaller Epistles, as well as their relative unimportance, are quite enough to account for their more gradual acceptance, even if they were written by the author of the First. Pfleiderer’s statement, that the Second and Third Epistles are described in the Muratorian Fragment as written in John’s name to do honour to him, rests on a very doubtful interpretation of the passage in which two Johannine Epistles, almost certainly the First and Second, are mentioned, after which comes the sentence dealing with the Wisdom of Solomon.

Schwartz’s regards the two Epistles as, "in contrast to the First, genuine letters of a real Elder," whose name, however, cannot have been John, or it would not have been necessary "to cut away his real name, in order to bring these interesting documents into the Canon." This is an excellent reason for supposing that the name John never stood in these Epistles. It does not help us to determine the probability or improbability of the view that the letters were written by one John, who described himself as "the Elder" without adding his name.

The impossibility of a Chiliast such as Papias’ "John the Elder" having any part in the composition of the Johannine literature is emphasized by many writers, especially by Pfleiderer.

1 Ueber den Tod der Söhne Zebedai, p. 47.
and Réville ("ce presbytre Jean en qui le millénaire Papias saluait un de ses maitres," Le Quatrième Évangile, p. 50). All we know of him, if in this case we may trust Irenæus more than many writers are usually willing to do, is that Papias recorded on his authority the famous Chiliastic saying about the fruitfulness of the Messianic kingdom. In what sense he interpreted it we do not know. If the Presbyter to whom Papias owes his account of S. Mark is the same, as would seem most probable, he was certainly capable of sound judgment and careful appreciation. And one phrase which occurs in the Third Epistle recalls, or is recalled by, the words of Papias' preface (ἀπ᾽ αὐτῆς τῆς αληθείας). It is somewhat hasty to assume that the "Presbyter venerated by the Chiliastic and stupid Papias" (Réville, p. 316) was incapable of anything "spiritual." He handed down a "Chiliastic" saying, or one which was perhaps too grossly "Chiliastic" in its literal meaning to have been taken literally, even by the Elder who handed it down. His views were probably Millenarian. It would be difficult to find any one "venerated" at the end of the first or beginning of the second century who did not in some sense share the ordinary Chiliastic expectation of most Christians. But as to how "gross," or how "stupid," his views were we really know nothing. Even Papias may have been better than Eusebius thought him. In any case we have but slender evidence to justify the transference of all his "stupidities" to the Elder John whose traditions he has preserved. The position of authority, not claimed so much as used and acted upon, by the author of these two Epistles, is such as perhaps could only belong to a representative of the older generation. Whether it would be natural for John the Apostle to describe himself as "the Elder" is at least open to question. There can be no doubt of the naturalness of the title if used by such an one as John the Elder, the disciple of the Lord.

We have every reason to believe that an "Elder" held a predominant position in Asia Minor about the close of the first century. There are valid reasons for calling him John. His relation to John the son of Zebedee is a mystery which, at present at least, we have not enough evidence to enable us to solve. Harnack's conjecture, based on the most natural interpretation of the fragment of Papias' preface which Eusebius has preserved, that he was a pupil of John the Apostle, and in some sense a disciple of the Lord, is perhaps the hypothesis which leaves fewest difficulties unsolved. That he is the author of the two smaller Epistles is the view which seems to be best supported by external tradition and by internal probability. The arguments in favour of different authorship for Gospel, First Epistle, and the two shorter Epistles are not negligible, but they are not con-exclusive. The theory which attributes to him some share at least in the writing of Gospel and First Epistle is the most probable conjecture that we can at present make. To what extent he is answerable for the matter of either is a difficult problem, perhaps insoluble in the present state of our knowledge. Most of the difficulties which every historical inquirer must feel to stand in the way of attributing the Gospel (in its present form) and the Epistle (they are less in this case than in that of the Gospel) to the son of Zebedee are modified, though they are not removed, by the hypothesis that a disciple is responsible for the final redaction of his master's teaching. The longer and the more carefully the Johannine literature is studied, the more clearly one point seems to stand out. The most obviously "genuine" of the writings are the two shorter Epistles, and they are the least original. To believe that an author, or authors, capable of producing the Gospel, or even the First Epistle, modelled their style and teaching on the two smaller Epistles, is a strain upon credulity which is almost past bearing. Are we not moving along lines of greater probability if we venture to suppose that a leader who had spent his life in teaching the contents of the Gospel, at last wrote it down that those whom he had taught, and others, "might believe, and believing might have life in His name"; that after some years he felt that the message of the Gospel had not produced the effect on their lives and creed which he had expected, and that he therefore made the appeal of the First Epistle, ἡκούσατε ἀπ' ἀρχῆς μενέτω, bidding them make use of what they already knew, and assuring them that in it they would find the help they needed to face the circumstances in which they now found themselves placed? The differences between the two writings may well be due to the needs of a simpler and more popular appeal. It is the circumstances of the hearers and their capacity to understand which determine his message, rather than any very clear change in his own position or opinions. At the same time or at a later period he may have had to deal with the special circumstances of a particular Church or particular individuals, and again the special circumstances of his hearers and their intellectual and spiritual capacity have determined the form and the substance of his appeal. The term "Catholic" is a misleading one. It has perhaps misled the critical even more than the conservative interpreters of these Epistles. It is impossible to understand these letters if they are regarded as having been originally composed as a message to the whole Church, or for all time. The writer knows those whom he addresses. He writes with full knowledge of their immediate circumstances and of their spiritual powers. If we are to interpret his words, we must consider, not so much what he could have said himself, as the circumstances which tied him down to saying that which his readers could understand. It is possible that advancing years may have modified his views, and even weakened his powers. But the special circumstances which called for his intervention, and perhaps the νοθρότης of his hearers, offer a far more probable explanation of the difference which we cannot but feel between the spiritual heights of the Gospel and the common-place advice of the shorter Epistles. He who proclaimed ὁ λόγος σάρξ ἐγένετο may still have believed it, though he finds himself compelled to write μὴ μιμοῦ τὸ κακὸν ἀλλὰ τὸ ἀγαθὸν, and to make appeals to his personal authority in the case of those to whom his deeper thoughts were as a sealed book.

§ 10. THE SECOND EPISTLE.

The chief object of this letter is to give the Church or the family to whom it is addressed, clear advice and instruction about the reception of Christians from other Churches. The duty of hospitality was recognized and enforced. We may compare He. ΧΗ. 2.

It was a necessary part of the duty of each Church, or of some leading members in it, during the whole of the period when the union of the various members of the Christian body was being secured by the work of "Apostles, Prophets, Evangelists, Teachers," who went about from place to place, while the resident officers were expected to submit to the authority of the higher rank. In the opinion of the Elder, who clearly claims to exert his authority over all the Churches in the sphere in which he lives, there was danger of the abuse of hospitality. False teachers are taking advantage of the opportunity to disseminate their errors. So he lays down the two practical tests which may form guiding principles in offering hospitality to strangers. They are the same points which are insisted upon in the First Epistle. Those who carry out the Gospel in their lives, who "walk in love," and who recognize fully the reality and the permanence of the Incarnation, who "confess Jesus Christ coming in the flesh," are to be received. The Progressives who do not abide in the "teaching of the Christ" must be refused. Even to give them greeting is to participate in their evil works.

Incidentally the Elder takes the occasion thus offered to encourage those who are faithful, who are "walking in truth," and to urge on them once more the duty of "walking in love." as well as of remaining true to the teaching which they had heard "from the beginning." He reserves what he has to say at greater length, till he has the opportunity of seeing and conversing with them, on the visit which he hopes soon to be able to pay them.
THE EPISTLES OF S. JOHN

The situation recalls that of the Didache, where the same difficulty of how the "Prophets" are to be received is seriously felt and discussed at length. There the danger is rather of those who make a regular custom of demanding maintenance as Prophets who come in the name of the Lord, and so of living in idleness at the expense of others. In the Epistle the dissemination of false teaching is the chief danger to be guarded against. It would be rash to describe the situation found in the Didache as a later development than that which is suggested in this letter. At the same time the similarity of the circumstances does not necessitate the assignment of both writings to exactly the same date. Development was at different rates in different places. From what we know of the history of the Asiatic Churches, we might naturally expect stages to be reached there at an earlier date than in some other regions. The evidence, therefore, of this resemblance to the Didache should be used with caution in determining the date of the Epistle. In itself the parallel is clear and interesting. We may also compare the praise bestowed on the Smyrnaeans by Ignatius for their hospitable reception of Philo and Agathopus (Ign. Sm. 10), or Polycarp's thanks to the Philippians for their kindness to the prisoners (Pol. ad Phil. 1).

The well-known controversy about the destination of this Epistle shows no signs of a final settlement. The view that it was addressed to an individual lady and not to a Church has of late been most vigorously supported by Rendel Harris (Expositor, 1901). Advocates of this view have found her name either in Electa or in Kyria, which is not unknown as the name of a woman (cf. Lücke, p. 444).

The names of Mary and Martha have also been suggested, the former because of the incident recorded in Jn. xix. 27, the latter for a supposed play on the name (Martha-domina-Kyria). It is hardly necessary to discuss seriously these conjectures of Knauer and Volkmar. The name Electa is almost certainly excluded by ver. 13, and by the improbability of two sisters bearing the same name. If the letter is addressed to an individual, the name is clearly not given. The use of Kyria is very wide. It may be a purely formal title of courtesy. It is certainly used frequently by near relations, whether as a token of affection, or mark of courtesy real or assumed. In spite of Rendel Harris' ingenious suggestions, the use of the word by relations, even if the Editors of Papyri are frequently right in translating it "My dear," does not go very far towards establishing the view that we have in this Epistle a "love-letter." The formal use of κυρία is undoubtedly well established, and the character of the Epistle can only be determined by more general considerations. If we examine the whole contents of the letter we can hardly escape the conclusion that a Church and not an individual is addressed. The language of ver. 1, “Whom I love in truth, and not I only, but all who know the truth,” is at least more natural if it is addressed to a community. It is clear from ver. 4 that the writer can only praise the conduct of some of the “children,” while the address in ver. 1 is general, “and her children.” If it is necessary to assume that the word τέκνα has a narrower meaning in ver. 1 than in ver. 4, the difficulty, such as it is, is about the same whether the reference is to a single family or to a whole Church. Jülicher’s argument (Einleitung, p. 216) does not gain much by the inclusion of this point. We cannot say more than that the references to the whole family in ver. 1, and to a part of it in ver. 4, are rather more natural if the “family” be a Church. On the other hand, the change between singular and plural (4, 5, 13 as compared with 6, 8, 10, 12) certainly favours the view that a Church is addressed. Interesting parallels of a similar change between singular and plural have been noticed in the Book of Baruch. And, as Jülicher truly says, the general contents of the letter are “anything rather than private in character.”

§ 11. THE THIRD EPISTLE.

The general outline of the circumstances which led to the writing of this Epistle may be traced with some certainty, though there are many details which cannot be so certainly determined.

There can be no doubt that it is addressed to an individual, and not to a Church: though nothing is known for certain about the Caius to whom it is sent; and his identification with any of the other bearers of that name who are mentioned in the New Testament, or known to early tradition, is extremely precarious.

The object of the letter is to claim the good services of Caius on behalf of some travelling Missionaries who are about to visit Caius’ Church, and who are either members of the Church over which the Elder presides, or have recently visited it. It would seem that the Missionaries had previously visited the Church of Caius, and had been hospitably received by him. On their return to (?) Ephesus they had borne public witness at a meeting of the Church to the kindness which they had received at his hands. On the ground of this the Elder confidently appeals to Caius to repeat his former kindness, when the occasion arrives, on their next visit to his Church. He claims on their behalf hospitality and help. They should be "sent forward" in a manner worthy of the Master whom they served. And they had a right to claim support, for they had maintained the Pauline custom in their work among heathen, of receiving nothing from those to whom they preached (cf. Ac. xx. 35; 1 Th. ii. 9; 2 Th. iii. 8). All Christians (ver. 8) were bound to support and help forward such work to the best of their power. To do so was to work for the Truth, or rather to make themselves fellow-workers with Truth itself.

The Elder had previously written to the Church of which Caius and Diotrephes were members. But Diotrephes, whose ambition was known to the Elder, and who had succeeded in gaining an ascendancy over the Church, or at any rate over the majority of its influential members, had managed either to suppress the letter, or to persuade the Church to ignore its contents. He not only refused himself to receive those who came with the Elder's commendation, but made it his policy to try to drive out of the Church those who were anxious to take the opposite course, if he could not succeed in preventing their efforts by simpler methods (ver. 10). It was time for the Elder to intervene. He has to remind Caius and those who will listen to his admonitions that there are such things as right and wrong. Their choice will show whether they are Christians in anything more than name. To do the right is the sign of the birth from God, and of the enjoyment of the Vision of God.

It would seem that Diotrephes had found his opportunity in the suspicion in which Demetrius was held by the Church. He is clearly one who possessed the esteem of the Elder, and who had been recommended to Caius' Church by him. His relation to that Church and to the travelling Missionaries is not equally certain, and different views have been held on this point. Some have regarded him as one of the Missionaries, or as their leader, to whom the Elder had borne witness in a previous letter of commendation. Others have thought, from the separate mention of him and of the travellers, that he had nothing to do with them, but was a member of the Church to which the letter is addressed. Such a view is quite possible. Without accepting the over-ingenious conjecture of Dom Chapman, that the Elder had already mentally designated him Bishop of the Church, it is certainly natural to suppose, with Wilamowitz, that one of the main objects of the letter is to serve as a letter of commendation for Demetrius, and that he at least travelled with the Missionaries on the journey which forms the occasion of the Epistle, whether he was actually one of their company or not. It would, of course, be fairly easy to form a good many hypotheses which would all suit the few facts of the situation known to us. It is better to confine ourselves to the simplest and most natural. And that would seem to be that Demetrius was one of the band of Missionaries whom the Church of Caius and Diotrephes had special reasons to mistrust. It seems to need all the authority, official or personal, which the Elder possessed, and all his personal influence with a faithful friend, to ensure a hospitable reception for one who has, in his opinion unjustly, fallen under suspicion.

If it is idle to identify the recipient of the letter with any other Caius known to the New Testament, it is even less profitable to attempt the identification of Demetrius. Dom Chapman's suggestion, that he is the Demas of 2 Ti. iv. 10 (Δημᾶς γὰρ με ἐγκατέλιπεν ἀγαπήσας τὸν νῦν αἰῶνα καὶ ἐπορεύθη εἰς Θεσσαλονίκην), has little in its favour save its necessity to complete a fabric of conjecture of which the ingenuity is far more apparent than its probability. Prof. Bartlet's suggestion, that Demetrius the silversmith (of Ac. xix. 24) is more likely, may be placed slightly higher in the scale of probability. But the game of guessing is misleading in attempts to reconstruct the unknown circumstances under which the Epistle was written. It is more reasonable to confine our attention to what may be legitimately deduced from the actual references of the Epistle.

A further question is raised by ver. 9. Are we to identify the letter to which reference is there made with the Second Epistle? In favour of this have been urged (1) the close connection of the two Epistles in tradition; (2) the probability that 2 Jn. is addressed to a Church; (3) the close connection between the two Epistles in thought and language. Of these arguments the first is of doubtful value. The connection is hardly so close as is often supposed, the evidence for a period of acceptance of two Johannine Epistles (i.e. 1, 2 Jn.) without the third is really considerable. The others deserve serious consideration, and in reference to (3) we must certainly remember that the object of both letters is to a large extent the same, the determination of the rules which should guide Churches in the matter of receiving and offering hospitality to travelling Teachers. In some ways the negative rules of 2 Jn. form a natural supplement to the more positive suggestions of the Third Epistle. But, on the other hand, serious difficulties are raised by (1) the absence of any mention in 3 Jn. of the False Teachers, and (2) the absence in 2 Jn. of any reference to Diotrephes, or to the high-handed proceedings of an official or prominent member of the Church. Of these reasons, which are urged by Harnack, the first is the most important. The high-handed action of any prominent member might naturally succeed rather than precede the reception of the letter which contained the Elder’s instructions. He also urges that 2 Jn. presupposes an altogether different state of feeling and opinion in the Church to which it is addressed as compared with what we may naturally conclude from the Third Epistle. The attitude of the two Churches to strangers is quite different. Perhaps a more convincing reason is found in the fact that the Second Epistle does not contain the matter which we should expect to find in the “suppressed” letter to which the Elder refers in 3 Jn. It must have dealt with the question (or questions) of the reception of Demetrius and the travelling Missionaries; at least it is natural to suppose that 3 Jn. is written to secure through the good services of a private friend what the Elder had demanded in a more public way. It is, of course, possible that the reception of his requirements in 2 Jn. had been such that he now hesitated to make public the different requests which he writes to Caius. But the former supposition is the more natural. We should probably therefore add this instance to the many indications in the Epistles of the N.T. of a wider correspondence than has been preserved in the Canon.

§ 12. Historical Background of the Two Epistles.

Within the last few years a number of ingenious, if highly conjectural, reconstructions have been attempted of the circumstances which called out the two Epistles, with more or less complete identifications of the persons named, and of the Churches addressed. Detailed criticism of many points suggested by these schemes is perhaps better reserved for the notes on the text. But some general account of one or two of them may be attempted.

The most ingenious, and possibly the least convincing, is that which Dom Chapman contributed in his articles in the Journal of Theological Studies (1904, pp. 357 ff., 517 ff.). Seeing rightly that the language in which Demetrius is commended by the Elder clearly implies that he had for some reason or other fallen under suspicion, he puts forward the bold conjecture that Demetrius is the Demas of 2 Ti. iv. 10 who forsook S. Paul when danger became acute (contrast Col. iv. 14), “having loved this present world.” Dom Chapman reminds us that the Second Epistle to Timothy found him at Ephesus, and suggests that the Asiatic Churches were inclined to take a harsh view of the conduct of Demas. In the recipient of this Epistle he sees the Caius of Corinth, whose hospitality is praised in Ro. xvi. 23 (“mine host and of the whole Church”); and following the early tradition recorded by Origen (on Ro. x. 41), that this Caius... became the first Bishop of Thessalonica, he suggests that Demas, who was perhaps a Macedonian, when he left Rome had travelled to Thessalonica, which he may have left when the reception of 2 Timothy made his position there untenable. At a later date he wished to return, and when he presented himself with a commendatory letter from the Elder he was well received by Caius, but the "pratings" of Diotrephes persuaded the Church to refuse him hospitality. He now has to pass through Thessalonica on his way westwards, and bears a second letter from the Elder to secure a more friendly reception. It is perhaps sufficient here to suggest that imaginary reconstructions of this kind do very little to help forward the study of history. A series of propositions, none of which are in themselves either impossible or specially probable, when combined into a single hypothesis fail to form a satisfactory basis for exegesis. And the question naturally arises, have we sufficient ground for assuming that the Elder would claim such a position of authority in respect of the Churches of Macedonia as is implied in the words and threatened action of the Third Epistle?

His suggestions with regard to the Second Epistle are even more hazardous. The description of the Church as loved by all who know the truth, and as having heard the commandment from the beginning, is specially applicable to Antioch or Rome. The "elect sister" is naturally the Church of Ephesus. He connects ἐκλεκτός, a word foreign to the Johannine vocabulary, with the emphatic reference in 1 P. v. 13, ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτή, and suggests that the phrase "walking in truth, as we received commandment for the faith," should be interpreted in the light of Jn. x. 17, 18, where the "Father's command" is connected with the laying down of life. The community to whom these words are addressed must have proved their faithfulness by martyrdom. So we are led to the conclusion that it is the Church of Rome which is addressed. The False Teachers have lost their footing in Asia Minor, the First Epistle has closed the doors of Asiatic Churches to them. So they are making attempts elsewhere, and the warning is issued to the Church of the metropolis. Such is the hypothesis in general outline. It is supported by many ingenious suggestions as to details. But the interpretation of ver. 4 in connection with Jn. x. 17 is too doubtful to serve as a foundation.

Professor Bartlet (JTS, 1905) has pointed out several of the difficulties presented by the text of the Epistles, if it is translated correctly, to these ingenious conjectures, while he rightly welcomes the correct appreciation of the significance of the terms in which Demetrius is commended. His suggestion that Demetrius the silversmith may be meant, is at least as probable as Dom Chapman’s conjecture. And his further suggestion that Thyatira is more probably the Church of Caius and Demetrius has at least the merit of looking in the right quarter, within the natural sphere of the Elder’s influence and authority.

Dr. Rendel Harris has made no attempt at so complete a restoration of the background of these Epistles. The instances which he quotes of κυρία used in the correspondence of near relatives are interesting. He has hardly succeeded in proving that even in such cases it is used as a term of affection, rather than of courtesy, or (?) mock courtesy. And even if this point were proved, it would not go far towards proving that in this particular Epistle it is so used. Its official and ceremonious use is in any case far more frequent. By itself it hardly establishes the personal and affectionate character of the letter, or justifies the description of it as a “love-letter.” The question of “lady” or “Church” must be determined by the general character of the letter. He has also noticed an interesting parallel to the language of 2 Jn. 8, in Ru. ii. 12, which should form a welcome addition to our Biblical marginal references, and to the many indications that the author of the Johannine Epistles was well acquainted with the Scriptures of the Old Testament. But it would be safer not to deduce from the occurrence of ἐργασία and μισθὸς πλήρης in one verse in Ruth the suggestion that the recipient of this letter was elderly, a heathen Christian, and probably a widow!

In this connection we should perhaps mention the conjecture of Thoma,¹ that Pergamos should be regarded as the Church with which the Second Epistle deals, on the ground, according to the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 46), that Caius was ordained bishop of that Church by John. The list of “Bishops” mentioned in Ap. Con. vii. 46 is worth quoting: James the brother of the Lord, Symeon, ὁ τοῦ Κλεώσα, Jude the brother of James, Zacchaeus, Cornelius, Theophilus, Euodius, Ignatius, Annianus, Avilius, Linus, Clement, Timothy, John, “by me John,” Ariston, Strataias, Ariston, Gaius (Mycenae), Demetrius (Philadelphia), Dionysius, Marathones (?), Archippus, Philemon, Onesimus, Crescens, Aquila, Nicetas, Crispus. It might perhaps afford interesting evidence as to the contents of the Canon. But its predominantly Biblical character hardly inspires confidence.

Of a very different character to these curiosities of exegesis is the important contribution of Harnack to the interpretation of these Epistles (Texte u. Untersuchungen, xv. First Series). Their chief importance lies in the information they afford with regard to a certain stage of the development of Church life and organization in the Asiatic province. The position of the Elder is unique. He is widely known. It is unnecessary for him to add his own name to the title which will serve to identify him. If he lives in Ephesus, the members of other Churches are his children (3. 4). He claims the right to lead them, and to know no greater joy than to hear that they are walking in the paths of truth. He claims his share in the work which has brought the Churches to their present state (ἃ ἠργασάμεθα, 2. 8). Assured of being in the truth himself, he claims to judge whether others are "walking" in it, and have witness borne to them by it (3. 2, 3; 2. 1-4; 3. 12). He does not hesitate to place his own witness by the side of the witness of the truth itself (3. 12). He uses the plural of authority (3. 9, 10, 12; 2. 8). As leader and as judge he threatens in the confident assurance that his personal intervention will put an end to what is wrong (3. 10). From a distance he issues his commands to individuals and to Churches alike. The sphere of his authority is apparently large. Within it he administers praise or censure; he assigns punishment or reward without hesitation. He passes the most absolute judgments on prominent persons (3. 10, 12). He receives, through members of other Churches who travel, or through Evangelists, in full Church assembly (3. 6) or in other ways (2. 4), statements about the teaching and behaviour of Churches and of leading individuals (3. 3 ff., 12), and makes use of these reports in his letters. We are reminded of S. Paul's dealings with his Churches, and of his similar claims to authority and practical use of it. We may be surprised that thirty years after the death of Paul another should hold such a position in Asia. But this is no proof that the work of Paul had fallen to pieces. The testimony of Irenaeus and Polycarp proves the contrary. The position which has been described might well be held by the "Elder" of whom tradition knows, and whom Papias describes as a disciple of the Lord. Such an one could maintain his claim to the position of patriarchal monarchic authority which we find presupposed in these Epistles.

Harnack next turns to the evidence of the relation of the Elder to the travelling Missionaries and the Churches. The Third Epistle is written to accredit some travelling Evangelists to Caius; the Second, to warn some Church or individual against certain travelling false teachers. The custom to which these facts point is neither new nor of very long standing (3. 7; cf. 2. 10, 11). The importance of such teachers is clearly seen if we compare 3. 8 with 2. 11. The writer does not identify himself with them, but he values them and their work highly (3. 6, ἀξίως τοῦ θεοῦ). Their work is missionary, not among those who are already brethren, from whom they ought to receive support, as they obey the Lord's command. On their return to the place whence they set out they appear before the assembly of the Church and tell how they have prospered, and how they have been received (3. 6). Thus the Elder uses them as a means by which he can exercise control over his Churches. But a reaction is making itself felt against this supervision. Diotrephes regards the Elder and the travelling brethren as forming one party. He tries, apparently with success, to set his Church against them. He would withdraw it from this supervision which the Elder claims to exercise. He will not "receive" his messengers. And the majority of the Church apparently lean to the side of Diotrephes, though the Elder still has his friends (3. 15). The Elder cannot be sure that the letter which he wrote will ever reach the Church. Yet he feels sure of victory, if he comes in person. Here then we have to notice the leading of a single man. We have reached the beginnings of the monarchical Episcopate. We are in the heat of the struggle of the old patriarchal provincial mission organization against the consolidation of the individual Churches, as they threw off all outside influence and developed the Episcopate. Diotrephes takes the lead in this movement. The Elder mistrusts the new movement, and tries to keep it under his control. He sees in it only the ambition of individuals. Yet he fights for a failing cause. He is obliged to confess the dangers of false teaching being disseminated by the travelling Missionaries. By addressing the Church as ὑπατή he practically recognizes its independence. Harnack's question, "Would Paul have done so?" is suggestive.

Thus these two Epistles give us a valuable contribution to the history of an obscure period. We get a glimpse into the earlier stages of the development of the monarchical Episcopate. The differences which we find in Ignatius fifteen or twenty years later are noticeable. In his time monarchical Episcopacy is established throughout Asia. Each Church is independent; it receives from outside only brotherly advice. The danger arising from heretical teachers who travel from place to place is still felt acutely. But travelling "prophets and teachers" and supervising "elders" have disappeared. The change which these Epistles show us in the making is already made in this region.

It seems almost impertinent to criticize this admirable summary of the position which forms the background of the two Epistles. Few would question the importance of its contribution to the understanding of their contents. It is, however, doubtful whether it points to exactly the right moment in the development of the organization of the Asiatic Churches. And its weakest part is the attitude which it represents the Elder as having assumed with regard to the new movement. It is clear that the old system is breaking down. The generation of those who could claim and exercise the kind of authority, recognized and accepted as valid but unofficial, which the “Elder” clearly regards as his by right, and which he is confident he can still maintain, is passing away. Those who have a right to speak and act in virtue of their connection with earlier days have almost dissappeared. And in his own case he can no longer be sure of his authority, if it is exercised only from a distance. The personal ambition of individual members of the Churches is getting beyond his control. In one case he cannot feel sure that his letter will reach those for whom it was intended. He is doubtful as to the reception which will be given to those who come with his own personal commendation. He is evidently afraid that false teaching, which he has succeeded in silencing in his own Church, if we may use the evidence of the First Epistle in this connection, will receive only too ready a welcome in a neighbouring Church. It is equally clear that an ambitious member of a Church can count on a widespread feeling of discontent with the present informal arrangements and customs, which he can utilize to further his own views and perhaps interests. But is this the struggle of the local Churches to free themselves and set up a local Episcopate? Or is the Episcopate the means adopted to deal with the private ambitions of individual members of Churches who have made themselves prominent, and the danger which arose from the spread of various forms of teaching, and of division and dissension in consequence? And what was the attitude of the Elder to the new movement? Is he struggling against it? Or did he see in some such change of organization a way of meeting the danger which the old system could no longer control? Will Caius or Diotrephes be the first monarchical Bishop, of Pergamus or of Thyatira?

The passages which Harnack quotes to show the connection of the Elder with the “Bishops” of Asia certainly do not point to his having fought a losing battle against the new movement. The tradition which these passages embody has doubtless been modified in the light of later views about Episcopacy. But while this is almost certainly the case, it is going in the face of such evidence as we possess to represent the Elder as opposed to a movement with which he is always represented as being in close connection.
The following passages may be quoted. They prove quite clearly the connection of the elders with the Episcopal movement in Asia so far as tradition is concerned.

Mur. Fr. 1. 10: "Cohortantibus condiscipulis et episcopis suis."

Victorinus Petau. Schol. in Apoc. xi. 1: "Conuenerunt ad illum de finitimis provinciis omnes episcopi."

Jerome, de Vir. Illus. 9: "Scritpsit euangelium, rogatus ab Asiae episcopis, aduersus Cerinthum." Cf. Euseb. H. E. vi. 14 (Clement): \( \pi \rho \omicron \tau \rho \alpha \pi \alpha \epsilon \nu \tau \alpha \tau \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \delta \nu \\omicron \upsilon \rho \omicron \iota \mu \omicron \omicron \lambda \omicron \omicron \). Augustine, Prologue to the Tractatus in Joann. : "Compulsus ab Episcopis Asiae scripsit."

Clem. Alex. Quis Dives, 42: \( \acute{\alpha} \pi \gamma \epsilon i \tau \alpha \pi \alpha \kappa \alpha \lambda \lambda \omicron \upsilon \omicron \mu \epsilon \nu \varsigma \varsigma \varsigma \varsigma \alpha \varsigma \varsigma \upsilon \omicron \omega \rho \iota \varsigma \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \varsigma \varsigma \upsilon \omicron \nu \omicron \omicron \upsilon \omicron \nu \upsilon \delta \nu \upsilon \upsilon \dot{\iota} \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsigma \upsilon \alpha \upsilon \varsig...
NOTES ON 1 JOHN.

1-4. Introduction.

1. ὃ ἦν ἀπ᾽ ἀρχῆς] What the writer has to announce about the Word of Life, the revelation of life, is no new discovery. The revelation began with creation. It was continued in the history of the nations and the People, in the work of Prophets, Psalmists, Legislators. It culminated in the earthly life and teaching of Jesus of Nazareth. The mystery, which is as old as creation, was gradually revealed, till it was completely manifested in Jesus the Christ, the Son of God. The words περὶ τοῦ λόγου τῆς ζωῆς necessitate some such interpretation of the phrase. It cannot refer to the eternal, pre-existent nature of the personal Word, though in the writer's conception this is no doubt included. The whole message of God's revelation, as it has been gradually unfolded, is the object of the writer's ἀγγελία. The mystery which he takes his part in "revealing" is concerned with the eternal reality underlying the phenomena apparent to sense-perception and needed to explain them. What he has to say is one stage in its unveiling; his words are part of a process of teaching which began when "God said, Let there be light." Cf. Rothe, p. 18; part of his note may be quoted or paraphrased. "The thought of an original being, which has its object in itself, is indeed the most abstract thought to which human consciousness can reach; but yet it lies close to hand, and no one can dispense with it who examines attentively himself and his surroundings. That which falls under the cognizance of sense-perception shows itself to the careful observer to be untrue. But every intelligent man must feel the desire to find somewhere an existence which has not come into being, but which is from eternity, and to be able to rest on this. This the Apostle has found. He cries triumphantly to his readers that he knows of a Being, transcending all that is transitory, the ground of what is temporal and finite. Such a reality can only be found in so far as it is revealed under material forms and enters into the world of matter. In Christ the writer claims to have found this eternal reality, which transcends the limits of the sensible and material. What he has seen in Jesus and heard from Him is to himself indubitable evidence of the truth of his claim.” This passage, which is really a paraphrase in more modern terms of thought of the Johannine conception of \( \zeta \omega \), does not, of course, explain by strict grammatical exegesis the meaning of the opening phrases of this Epistle, but it is an admirable expression of ideas which may reasonably be connected with them, and as such it deserves full consideration.

ἀρχῆς] Anarthrous. Cf. Jn. i. 1, vi. 64, xvi. 4; Gn. i. 1. That which is regarded by us as “beginning.” The anarthrous use of the word makes it denote “character, according to man’s apprehension,” rather than a definite fact or point of time. The parallels in Genesis and the Prologue of the Gospel exclude the possibility of a reference merely to the beginning of the Christian dispensation. For the writer’s use of \( \alpha \rho \chi \iota \), cf. note on ii. 7.

ὅ ἀκηκόαμεν] The author justifies his claim to be able to announce “that which was from the beginning” on the fact that a revelation of it has been made under the conditions of time and space, so that it has become intelligible to finite understanding. The perfect has its full force. A revelation has been made in terms which men can understand, and the results are abiding. What the writer and his contemporaries have heard and seen remains with them, so that they can make it known to others who have not themselves had the same privileges.

The “hearing” may perhaps include the whole revelation, of the nature of God and His relation to the world, from the beginning. But if it is not confined to the earthly life of Jesus Christ, that is what the writer has prominently in view.

ἐῳράκαμεν τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς] The revelation has been made through nature and through man. All the human powers of perception are necessary to grasp its fullness, and can be used for that purpose. The \( \tau \omega \ις \ δ ῥθαλμοῖς \) emphasizes the personal experience of the writer, and those whom he associates with himself by the use of the first person plural. The terms used in this preface can only be interpreted naturally as a claim on the writer’s part to have been an actual eye-witness of the earthly life of Jesus Christ. It is not impossible to suppose that the writer uses them metaphorically of a spiritual vision, the completeness of which can best be described under the metaphors of sense-perception. Such an interpretation, however, is forced and unnatural in the extreme. Clemen’s confession (\( Z.N.T.W \) vi. 281, 1905), that he can suggest no really satisfactory explanation of the words \( \alpha \iota \chiε\iota \rhoε\iota \iota \mu \iota \ιν \iota \iota \phi\iota\lambda\iota\acute{f}̣\acute{g}̣\grave{s}a\nu \) on these lines, is significant. Nothing but absolute necessity could justify their reference to "spiritual" perception. If on other grounds it is impossible to suppose that this Epistle, or other writings which cannot easily be separated from it, could have been written by an eye-witness of the life of Christ on earth, we should, of course, be compelled to accept this forced interpretation of the words; unless we admitted that the writer has put forward a false claim. But it is well to recognize that such a course is of the nature of a desperate expedient. Such a claim might naturally be met with the ironical words of Philo (De Decalogo, p. 195), ὥσ oútopos, ἃ μήτ' εἶδες μήτ' ἤκουσας, ὃς ἰδὼν, ὃς ἀκούσας, ὃς παρηκολουθηκὼς ἅπασιν, ἀφικόμενός μοι μαρτύρησον, which Windisch (Handbuch zum NT. iv. 2, p. 105) quotes to illustrate the phraseology of this passage. There can be no doubt as to what is the natural interpretation of the writer's words. These considerations hold good also against Karl's idea of ecstatic vision (Johanneische Studien, p. 3). The hypothesis that the writer when using the first personal plural identifies himself (?) and his readers with the Christian body, some of whom had actually seen the "Lord," is open to less objection, but is not really satisfactory. This use of the plural is quite natural in the passage which has sometimes been quoted from Irenaeus (v. i. 1), "per auditum nostrum vocem eius percipientes." Irenaeus is emphasizing the fact that the Incarnation was the only means of teaching men the truth about God. In the Introduicio to Book V. he has reminded his readers that the Church tradition goes back to Christ Himself. And Christ alone could teach men, in that as God He knows the things of God, and as man He can explain them intelligently to His fellow-men. Here the writer is contrasting his position with that of his readers. He will hand on to them what he and his fellows have seen and heard, that they too, though they have not seen, may believe and share his joy. See Briggs, The Messiah of the Apostles, p. 464; Findlay, Fellowship in the Life Eternal, pp. 87-89.
NOTES ON I JOHN

The passages quoted from Tacitus, Agricola, c. 45 (Mox nostrae duxere Helvidium in carcerem manus), and Augustine, Ep. 88. 8 (nostri oculi ab armatis uestris calce et aceto extinguuuntur), are not quite parallel. Tacitus, a member of the Senate, but absent from Rome at the time of the incident to which he refers, can naturally, addressing the public in a highly rhetorical passage, identify himself with the disreputable action of the body to which he belongs. Augustine, speaking as a Catholic, and addressing Donatists, can with equal propriety say, "We suffer persecution at your hands." But here the writer, speaking as a Christian to Christians, is emphasizing what he and others with whom he identifies himself, have to give to the Christians to whom he writes. "What we have seen and heard we tell you, that ye may share our joy.” The “we” are clearly distinguished from the whole body of Christians.

δ ἐθεασάμεθα] The “message” has so far been viewed in its permanent results. It has been “heard” and “seen” so that those who first received it have it as an abiding possession which they can impart to others. Now the facts of its reception are presented in such a way (by the use of the aorist) as to emphasize their character. The different tenses are used with reference to the same object under different aspects. Emphasis is first laid on the results, then on the method. The aorist presents its object as a complete fact, or series of facts regarded as one whole, having a definite character. The witness is not only abiding, it is also satisfactory in kind. It rests on complete and intelligent use of adequate opportunities. There is no reason for restricting the object of the two aorists to the disciples’ experiences after the Resurrection. Such a distinction must have been more clearly marked if the writer intended his readers to grasp it. The special reference of ψηλαφᾶν to Lk. xxiv. 39 (ἰδεῖτε τὰς χεῖράς μου καὶ τοὺς πόδας μου . . ψηλαφήσατε με καὶ ἴδετε), or to the incident recorded in Jn. xx. 26–29, where the word is not used, appears to be very doubtful. It is simpler to suppose that the same object is described in different ways, corresponding to the natural distinction in meaning between the perfect and aorist. But see Westcott, and comp. Ign. Smyr. iii. Cf. also Tert. Adv. Prax. xv., de An. xvii., de Pat. iii.

ἐθεασάμεθα] If βλέπειν is to “look,” and ὁρᾶν to “see,” θεᾶσθαι is to “behold,” intelligently, so as to grasp the meaning and significance of that which comes within our vision. Cf. Mt. vi. 1; [Mk.] xvi. 14; Lk. vii. 24; Jn. i. 14, 38, iv. 35, xi. 45; Acts i. 11; Ro. xv. 24; 1 Jn. iv. 12, 14. In the LXX the word occurs only eight times, and in the later books; cf. 2 Ch. xxii. 6, and especially 2 Mac. iii. 36 ἀπερ ἤν ὑπ’ ὄψιν τεθεαμένος. The word nearly always suggests careful and deliberate vision which interprets, rightly or wrongly, its object. The witnesses have not only seen and remembered. Their “seeing” was of such a character as to enable them to appreciate rightly the significance of what they saw.

ψηλαφᾶν is to grope or feel after in order to find, like a blind man or one in the dark; hence to handle, touch. The idea of searching sometimes disappears altogether. It may also be used in the sense of "examine closely." Cf. Polyb. vili. 18. 4 (quoted by L. and S.), πᾶσαν ἐπινοίαν: Gn. xxvii. 12, μὴ ποτὲ ψηλαφήσῃ με δὲ πατήρ μου (of Isaac): Dt. xviiiii. 29, ἔσῃ ψηλαφῶν μεσημβρίας: Is. lix. 10, ψηλαφήσους ώς τυφλοὶ τοῖχον: Ps. cxiii. 15, χεῖρας ἔχουσι καὶ οὐ ψηλαφήσουσι: Job xx. 10 (A), αἱ δὲ χεῖρες αὐτοῦ ψηλαφήσουσιν δύνασ. Here it naturally suggests all the evidence available for sense-perception other than hearing and sight. Possibly it emphasizes the reality of that with which they had been brought into contact, in opposition to the Docetism which may have characterized the views of the writer's opponents. It certainly marks the intimate character of their personal intercourse with the Lord. Their opportunities included all that was necessary to make their witness ἀληθινὴ as well as ἀληθής, satisfactory in kind as well as accurate so far as it went. They were competent witnesses who spoke the truth. Cf. Jn. xix. 35.
NOTES ON 1 JOHN

περὶ τοῦ λόγου τῆς ζωῆς [Dr. Westcott's phrase "the revelation of life" probably gives most accurately the meaning of the words: the whole message which reveals, or which gives life. Compare Jn. vi. 68, βῆματα ζωῆς αἰωνίου, and Jn. iii. 34, τὰ βῆματα τοῦ θεοῦ. The exact meaning of the genitive is doubtful. As a rule, when (ὁ) λόγος is followed by a genitive, not of a person, the genitive expresses the contents of the message. Cf. Mt. xiii. 19 (τῆς βασιλείας), Ac. xiii. 26 (τῆς σωτηρίας ταύτης), xiv. 3, xx. 32 (τῆς Χάριτος αὐτοῦ), xv. 7 (τοῦ εὐαγγελίου); 1 Co. i. 18 (ὁ τοῦ σταυροῦ); 2 Co. v. 19 (τὸν λόγον τῆς καταλαγῆς); Eph. i. 13 (τῆς ἀληθείας); Ph. ii. 16 (λόγον ζωῆς ἐπέχοντες); Col. i. 5 (τῆς ἀληθείας τοῦ εὐαγγελίου); 1 Th. ii. 13 (λόγον ἀκοῆς); 2 Ti. ii. 15 (τῆς ἀληθείας); He. vi. i (τῆς ἀρχῆς τοῦ Χριστοῦ); Apos. i. 3 (τοὺς λόγους τῆς προφητείας). On the other hand, where (τῆς) ζωῆς is added to ἃ noun as ἃ qualifying genitive it generally, though not always, denotes "life-giving," or some cognate idea. Cf. Jn. v. 29 (ἀνάστασιν), vi. 35 (ὁ ἄρτος), 48, 68 (βῆματα, cf. 63), viii. 12 (τὸ φῶς); Ac. ii. 28 (οἶκος,= Ps. xvi. 11), iii. 15 (τοῦ ἁρχηγοῦ), v. 20 (τὰ βῆματα); Ro. v. 18 (δικαίωσιν), vi. 4 (κανώντητα); Ph. ii. 16 (λόγον), iv. 3 (βίβλος); 2 Ti. i. 1 (ἐπαγγελίαν), Ja. i. 12 (τοῦ στέφανον); 1 P. iii. 7 (χάριτος); Apos. ii. 7 (τοῦ ξύλου), 10 (τοῦ στέφανον), iii. 5 (τῆς βιβλίου), xi. 11 (πνεῦμα), xvi. 3 (ψυχῆς); xvii. 8 (τὸ βίβλιον), xx. 12, 15, xxi. 27, xxi. 6 (τοῦ ὕδατος), xxii. 1 (ὕδατος), 2 (ξύλον), 14, 19 (τὸ ξύλον), 17 (ὕδωρ). But the two meanings are not mutually exclusive. The message which announces life gives life (cf. Jn. v. 39).

περὶ] What the writer has to announce concerns the word of life. He does not claim to handle the whole message. He has something to tell about it. On the bearing of this preparation as the meaning of the whole verse, see the note on ὃ ἦν ἀπ᾽ ἀρχῆς.

2. For the use of parenthesis to emphasize or explain a specially important word, cf. Jn. xix. 35. In this parenthesis the emphatic word is ἐφανερώθη, which is repeated at the end of the verse. The writer and his circle could bear their witness about the word of life, because the life had been manifested, to men and under conditions which made it possible for men to apprehend its nature. The reference is in quite general terms. ἦ ζωή is never used to express the being of the (personal) Logos, or pre-existent Christ.

According to Weiss, φανεροῦν never denotes the becoming visible of that which was before invisible, but the making clear of what was hitherto unknown (he compares Jn. ii. 11, iii. 21, vii. 4, ix. 3, xvii. 6). But the distinction is hard to maintain in view of the Johannine usage of verbs of sight to include the understanding of that which falls under the ocular vision (cf. Jn. iii. 3). φανεροῦν may be used of all processes of making known, whether intellectual or sensible.

ἀπαγγέλλομεν] It is doubtful whether a distinction can be maintained between ἀπαγγέλλειν, “to repeat with reference to the source from which the message comes,” and ἀναγγέλλειν, “to report with reference to the persons addressed” (ver. 5). See ver. 3, ἀπαγγέλλομεν καὶ ὑμῖν ἵνα καὶ ἡμεῖς κ.τ.λ.

τὴν ζωὴν τὴν αἰώνιον] For the double article, cf. ii. 25, and ver. 3, ἡ κοινωνία ἡ ἡμετέρα: Jn. x. 11, ὁ ποιμήν ὁ καλός. The idea is first put forward generally, and then more particularly defined.

It is strange to find it stated (Weiss, Comm. p. 28) that αἰώνιος is always used in the N.T. in the sense of endless duration, or even that ζωή αἰώνιος denotes in S. John (as in S. Paul) “our everlasting further life (ezwiges weiterleben) after the death of the body” (Karl, p. 6). It would be truer to say that it never has the sense of endless duration. On the other hand, it does not denote what is supra-temporal. It can only mean “belonging to the age” of which the writer is speaking or thinking, and so comes to mean possessed of the characteristics of that age. If the “age to come” is supra-temporal, then αἰώνιος denotes that the subject which it qualifies has this characteristic.

“Spiritual” probably suggests its meaning most clearly in popular language. The words which it is used in the N.T. to qualify are: τὸ πνεῦμα, ζωή, κόλασις, κρίσις, ἁμάρτημα (Mk. iii. 29, σφ. κρίσεως), σκηναῖ, ἁμαρτία, θεός, βάρος, δόξις, θεός, ἀληθός, παράκλησις, κράτος, δόξα, δόξα, σοφία, κρίμα, λύτρωσις, πνεῦμα, κληρονομία, διαθήκη, βασιλεία, εὐαγγέλιον. Of the 71 instances of its use in the N.T., 44 are passages in which it qualifies ζωή.
Its meaning is best considered in the light of this fact. It is noticeable that in the Johannine Gospel and Epistles, where it occurs 23 times, it is never used in any other connection.

ἥτις] The life manifested in Christ, to which His personal disciples could bear witness on the strength of what they had seen and heard, is eternal, inasmuch as it is in union with the Father that it attains to its true realization. The distinction between ὅς and ὅστις, which disappears altogether in late Greek, can still, as a rule, be traced in the New Testament, where in all probability ὅστις is never a mere substitute for the relative. It either suggests a reason for what has been stated before, as here, or it introduces the designation of a class to which the antecedent belongs. (Cf. Mt. vii. 26, xiii. 52.)

πρός] Cf. Jn. i. 2, ἦν πρὸς τὸν θεόν, and Dr. Westcott’s note on the differences of meaning between πρός and other prepositions denoting relations. Expressed in simpler language, the particular force of πρός would seem to be that it suggests a relation realized in active communion and intercourse. Cf. Mk. vi. 3, οὐκ εἰσὶν αἱ ἀδελφαὶ αὐτοῦ ὧδε πρὸς ἡμᾶς; ix. 19. The true life of the Son was realized in union and communion with the Father. By means of the Incarnation it was manifested to men.

8. ὃ ἑωράκαμεν καὶ ἀκηκόαμεν] Resumption. The announcement rests on eye- and ear-witness. The difference in order, if it is not purely a matter of rhythm, may perhaps throw more emphasis on the earthly life of the Incarnate Logos, in which what was seen naturally takes precedence of what was heard, as contrasted with the wider description of revelation in ver. 1, where hearing must come before seeing. The treatment of minute differences in this Epistle, and in the Johannine writings generally, is a difficult question. There can be no doubt that very often they are either deliberate, and intended to convey some slight change of meaning, or the outcome of the exact train of thought which has led to the particular expression.

καὶ ὑμῖν] To find in these words a proof that the writer is addressing a circle of readers different from those among whom he began his Apostolic work, and therefore a special appropriateness in their use by one who had changed the sphere of his activity from Palestine to Asia Minor, is forced. (Cf. Zahn, Einleitung in das NT. p. 566, “früher an anderen Orten . . . jetzt im Kreise der Gemeinden, an welche der 1 Jo. gerichtet ist”; trans. iii. p. 358.) Such a thought could not have been conveyed to his readers by so obscure a hint. It is always dangerous to read into the words of this Epistle the things which any particular theory of its authorship make it desirable to find there. On the other hand, the words do not “show the readers of this Epistle to be those who are the hearers of all his Apostolic preaching” (Weiss, p. 30). Their more probable significance is suggested by the following καὶ ἰμαὶσ. What the eye-witnesses have heard and seen they announce to others as well, in order that they too may share the fellowship which Apostles and disciples have so long enjoyed.

κοινωνίαν ἐχεῖτε] The exact phrase is found only in this Epistle in the N.T. The writer is rather fond of the use of ἐχεῖν with a substantive to intensify the meaning of a verb. Cf. his use of it with ἀμαρτίαν, χρείαν, παρρησίαν, ἐλπίδα, ἔσχα, κόλασιν. As contrasted with the simple verb, which merely expresses the fact, it may perhaps suggest the sense “to have and enjoy.” Κοινωνεῖν is always used of active participation, where the result depends on the co-operation of the receiver as well as on the action of the giver. Cf. Philo, Leg. ad Caium, § 4 (quoted by Grimm), τίς οὖν κοινωνία πρὸς Ἀπόλλωνα τῷ μηδὲν οἰκείον ἔπιτηδευκότι; 1 Co. x. 16, οὐχί κοινωνία τοῦ σώματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἐστίν; It does not properly denote a merely passive sharing, as μετοχή can express, though the words are sometimes used interchangeably; cf. 2 Co. vi. 14, τίς γὰρ μετοχῆ δικαιοσύνη καὶ ἀνομία ἡ τίς κοινωνία φωτὶ πρὸς σκότος; see T. S. Evans in the Speaker’s Comm. on 1 Co. x. 16.

καὶ ... δὲ] Cf. Jn. vi. 51, καὶ δ’ ἄρτος δὲ: 3 Jn. 12, καὶ ἰμαὶσ δὲ μαρτυροῦμεν. It may be considered doubtful whether “the καὶ emphasizes, while the δὲ serves as connecting particle.” The use of καὶ ... δὲ would seem rather to develop and intensify a thought or idea. See Ellicott on 1 Ti. iii. 10. “Fellowship, I say; and remember that the fellowship of which we speak, and which we enjoy, is no less than fellowship with God and His Son.” Comp. Jn. xvii. 11, 20–23.

μετὰ τοῦ πατρὸς κ.τ.λ.] Fellowship with God became possible when Christ revealed Him to men as the Father, with whom His children could enter into communication. Such fellowship, i.e. that which is possible between parent and child, is only realized in and through Jesus Christ, the man whom God sent to make Him known. The title Ἰησοῦς Χριστός always emphasizes both ideas, of the historical life and human nature of Jesus of Nazareth, and of the Divine commission of God’s Messiah. And the use of the title “Son” (μετὰ τοῦ νιοῦ αὐτοῦ) emphasizes His capacity to make God known. The writer can conceive of no adequate knowledge of God which can be apprehended by man except in so far as it is revealed in a real human life, by one who is an only-begotten Son of God. Only a Son can reveal the Father. Only an only-begotten Son, who, so to speak, sums up in Himself all the qualities of His Father, which are completely reproduced in one heir, and not distributed among many children, is in a position to make such a revelation complete. The burden of the writer's message is summed up in the last verse of the Prologue.
I. 8, 4.] NOTES ON I JOHN

4. ταῦτα] The reference is most probably to the contents of the Epistle, "already present to the writer's mind." There are many instances in which it is a matter of dispute whether the writer, in using οὗτος, αὕτη, ταῦτα, τοῦτο, ἐν τούτῳ, ἐκ τούτου, διὰ τοῦτο, etc., intends to refer to what has preceded or what follows. Both usages are found in the Epistle, but the reference forward would seem to be his prevailing custom. Sixteen instances may be noted where the reference is to what follows (preceded by καί, i. 4, ii. 3, iii. 23, 24; without καί, ii. 6, iii. 1, 8, 10, 16, iv. 2, 9, 13, 17, v. 4, 11, 14) as against seven where the reference to what preceded is at least probable (without καί, ii. 22, 26, iv. 6, v. 6, 13, 20; preceded by καί, iv. 3). Here the reference is probably to what follows. The ταῦτα are not identical with the message described in ver. 3, nor are they contrasted with it. They are the part of it, or the things to be said in explanation of it, which it is expedient that the author should communicate in writing. Scriptio valde confirmat (Bengel).

γράφομεν ἡμεῖς] Both words are emphatic. The αὐτόπται have always borne their witness by preaching or teaching. Now there is much that the survivors, or survivor, must write down. In this context ἡμεῖς must mean "we who have seen and heard," whether the seeing and hearing are to be interpreted literally or metaphorically. And the literal interpretation is undoubtedly the most natural. The word contains no claim to Apostolical authority, unless, indeed, none but Apostles could rightly claim to be witnesses of what has been described in vv. 1-3. And it does not justify the view that at the time of writing many still survived who had seen the Lord. The conditions are satisfied if even one survivor only is speaking in the name of those of whom he is the last representative, especially if he is addressing Christians among whom the later survivors had spent their last years. It points quite naturally to the "Johannine" circle at Ephesus, but it does no more than point. It offers no proof. The plur. γράφομεν does not occur again in the Johannine Epistles.

ἵνα . . . ἡ πεπληρωμένη] For the resolved tense, cf. Jn. xvi. 24. And for the sense, cf. Jn. xv. 11, xvii. 13, iv. 36, iii. 29. The writer's joy is increased the more his readers can realize the fellowship of which he has spoken, and to promote which is the object of his letter.

ἡμῶν] It is very difficult to decide between the readings ἡμῶν and ὑμῶν. The former is supported by better MSS, and the latter may possibly be affected by assimilation to Jn. xvi. 24. On the other hand, ἡμεῖς is almost certainly the true text just to the Gospel, "God hath no man seen at any time; God only begotten (or the only-begotten Son), who is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him."
before, and the reading ὑμῶν offers a pointed contrast, "we who have seen must write, that you who have not seen may enter into full joy." And it is a contrast which would not appeal to scribes. Perhaps, however, the ἡμῶν suits best the thought of the writer. He would not dissociate himself, and other teachers, from the common joy felt by all when his readers attain "fellowship." In the spiritual harvest, sower and reaper rejoice together.

απαγγελλομεν] pr. και N ἑκτ am. arm-codd. Thphyl.: καταγγελλομεν ἐκτ 2281 (Greg. 2).

ἀρέος (Greman™)

και νμωμ] pr. και ἐξ am. arm-codd. Thphyl.: καταγγελλομεν ἐκτ 2281 (Greg. 2).

νμωμ] pr. και ἐξ am. arm-codd. Thphyl.: καταγγελλομεν ἐκτ 2281 (Greg. 2).

και υμις] om. και sah, syr™

και η κοινωνια de] om. και boh-txt. | om. δε C* P 13. 27. 29. 69. 81. 180

πεπληρωμενη] τοπυ C*, τοπυ gaudeatis et vg. (om. gaudeatis et am.).

A. i. 5–ii. 27. First description of the two signs of fellowship with God, expressed negatively. First refutation of the twofold "lie." The "ethical" and "christological" theses presented one after the other, without any definition of their mutual relations.

I. i. 5–ii. 17. Walking in light the true sign of fellowship with God (ethical thesis). Refutation of the one "lie."

i. i. 5–ii. 6. The thesis maintained in two parallel statements.

(a) i. 5–10. The nature of God and the consequent relation of man to God.

i. 5–10. Having stated that his object in writing is to enable his readers to enter into fellowship, and that the mutual fellowship of Christians leads onwards to that higher fellowship with God in Christ on which indeed it is based, the writer proceeds to deduce from the nature of God the conditions under which fellowship with Him is possible. He does so by setting aside three false pleas often urged by those who claim such fellowship, the denial of the bearing of moral conduct on spiritual communion, of the responsibility for sinful action, of the actual fact of having sinned. With regard to the first two he states by way of contrast the provision made by God for overcoming the hindrances which would seem to prevent the possibility of fellowship with God, in the case of those who by their conduct or their confession refuse to shelter themselves behind such false pleas. The verses which follow contain a similar contrast, expanded into a different form in order to meet a difficulty which might be suggested by what has been said in this passage.

5. The nature of God. God is light, and therefore only those whose conduct can be described as "walking in light," can enjoy fellowship with such a Being.

In form the opening of the Epistle is closely parallel to that of the Gospel. This verse corresponds to Jn. i, 19, and it is introduced in exactly the same way (καὶ αὕτη ἐστὶν ἣ μαρτυρία). There also the idea of "witness" is taken up from the middle verses of the Prologue, just as ἀγγελία here takes up the ἀπαγγέλλομεν of vv. 2, 3.

καὶ] The connection with what immediately precedes is not obvious. According to Dr. Westcott it must be found in the idea of fellowship. "Fellowship must repose upon mutual knowledge" (p. 14). If we are to have fellowship with God and with the brethren, we must know what God is and what we are. False views on either subject must prove a fatal barrier to true fellowship. But see the preceding note. It would seem to be simpler to find the connection further back in the idea of the "announcement." He makes his announcement, contained in the letter he finds it necessary to write (ver. 4), with a special purpose which he has now stated. And the burden of the announcement is this, that God is light, and men must walk in light if they would enjoy His fellowship.

ἀγγελία] The simplest form of the word is chosen, as the writer wishes to describe its twofold aspect as a message from God to those whom he addresses, in the following words. It is an ἀπαγγελία from God Himself, ἣν ἀκηκόαμεν ἀπ᾽ αὐτοῦ. It is also an ἀναγγέλλομεν meant for those to whom he writes (καὶ ἀναγγέλλομεν ὑμῖν). The word may also suggest that the message contains a conception of God which men could not have formed for themselves without His help. It is a "revelation and not a discovery," it is the message which has come from God to be delivered to men.

φῶς ἐστίν] Anarthrous to express quality. God's nature is best described as "light." τὸ φῶς would have suggested light in some particular relation, cf. Jn. i. 5-9. φῶς describes His nature as He is, the description being true so far as it goes, though not complete. The primary idea suggested by the word in this context is "illumination." It is of the nature of light that it is and makes visible. God's nature is such that He must make Himself known, and that knowledge reveals everything else in its true nature. That this thought is present here is suggested by the following section (ii. 3 ff.). That God can be "known," and by those to whom the author is writing, is one of the leading ideas on which he lays special stress. But in view of the use of the metaphor of light and darkness in the Bible generally, and especially in S. John, and of the immediate context in this Epistle, it is impossible to exclude the ethical meaning from the signification of the word here. The context shows that this is the idea which he is most anxious to emphasize. The word must suggest the notes of Holiness and Purity as essential to God's nature. The conditions of fellowship on which he insists are closely akin to the Levitical "Be ye holy, for I am holy, saith the Lord." The full meaning, however, of what is contained in words is not limited to the sense in which they were probably used and understood by the writer and his first readers. Jesus' revelation of God as "Father" goes far beyond what was understood of it by the men of His own generation. For the more permanent meaning of the sentence, and the further ideas which it may be regarded as connoting, see Dr. Westcott's note (p. 16 f.); Findlay, p. 102.

This is not a mere repetition of the sentence in negative form, in accordance with the writer's love of double expression by parallel clauses, positive and negative. And it probably does not merely emphasize the "perfect realization in God of the idea of light." It emphasizes rather the completeness of revelation. God is not the ἄρρητος σημάς, or ἄνωθεν, of the more developed Gnostic systems, or the "unknowable" God of the Gnostic thought which preceded those systems. Though complete knowledge of God is impossible, He can be truly "known" here and now, under the conditions and limitations of human life. His nature is "light," which communicates itself to men, made in His image, till they are transformed into His likeness. From the ethical side, the words also emphasize the conditions of fellowship. Walking in darkness must exclude from the fellowship of Him "in whom is no darkness at all." Conduct is not the matter of indifference that in some of the teaching of the time it was made out to be. With the order of ideas here, λόγος, ζωή, φῶς, σκοτία (vv. 2, 5), comp. the same sequence in the Prologue to the Gospel (1, 2, 4, 5).
6-10. The relation of man to God as determined by the fact that God is light.

6. This revelation of God is not made to satisfy speculative curiosity. It bears directly on practical life. If truly apprehended, it puts aside three false pleas often put forward by men to excuse their “love of darkness.”

The first of these pleas is the “indifference of moral conduct to spiritual communion.” Fellowship with God is impossible where men “walk in darkness.” The light transforms those who receive it. Those who continue to practise the works of darkness cannot be in fellowship with the light. To assert the opposite is to state what is contrary to the facts as we know them (ψευδόμεθα). Now that the revelation of God as light has been made by Jesus Christ, such language is a deliberate lie. And the actual conduct of those who make such a statement belies the claim they put forward to have fellowship with God. Their actions are not an expression in life of the moral ideal revealed by Jesus Christ. They “do not the truth.”

ἐὰν εἴπωμεν] The form of the sentence introduces a not impossible, perhaps a not unlikely, contingency. And the use of the first person plural, where the writer is thinking of his τεκνία, with whom he is in spiritual fellowship, and with whom he identifies himself as “compassed with infirmity” and not free from the dangers to which he knows them to be exposed, is an indication that the influence of his opponents had made itself felt both in thought and practice among those who were in the main still faithful to the “truth” as he conceived it. Throughout the Epistle he writes under a pressing sense of danger. He is not wasting his weapons on purely hypothetical situations, of the realization of which he felt no serious apprehension.

μετ’ αὐτοῦ] the Father. The expression must have the same reference as the ἐν αὐτῷ of the preceding verse.

ἐν τῷ σκότει περιπατῶμεν] Cf. ii. 11, (ὅ μισῶν) ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ περιπατεῖ: Jn. viii. 12, περιπατήσῃ ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ: cf. Jn. xi. 9, 10. The metaphor used by the Lord in the Gospel has already become part of the natural religious language of Christian.

The use of περιπατεῖν of conduct (cf. the Hebrew יַחַן) is common in S. Paul and S. John. In the Synoptic Gospels it is found only in Mk. vii. 5, περιπατοῦσιν... κατὰ τὴν παράδοσιν. Cf. Ac. xxii. 21, τοῖς ἔθεσιν περιπατεῖν. For the LXX usage, cf. Pr. viii. 20, ἐν ὁδοῖς δικαιοσύνης περιπατῶ: Ec. xi. 9, περιπάτει ἐν ὁδοῖς καρδίας σου ἀμωμοσ; and for the use of "walk" in connection with φῶς, Is. ii. 5, δεῦτε πορευθῶμεν τῷ φωτὶ κυρίου.

For the false views combated in this verse we may compare Clem. Al. Str. iii. 4, 30, τοιαῦτα καὶ οἱ ἀπὸ Προδίκου ψευδωνύμους Γνωστικοὺς σφᾶς αὐτοὺς ἀναγενεῖσαις δώγματιζοντους νόμους μὲν φύσει τοῦ πρώτον θεοῦ λέγοντες αὐτοὺς καταχρώμενοι δὲ τῇ εὐγενείᾳ καὶ τῇ ἐλευθερίᾳ ἔχουσιν ως βούλονται βούλοντας δὲ φιληδονοις: and 5, 40, ἀδιαφόροις ἐν διδασκονοιν: and later, πᾶς βίος ἀκίνδυνος ἀκλεκτῷ. Iren. i. vi. 2, τὸ πνευματικὸν θέλονοι οἱ αὐτοὶ εἶναι ἀδύνατους φθορὰς καταδέξασθαι, κἂν ὅποιας συγκαταγένως πράξεσιν.

The distinction can hardly be maintained in this Epistle between σκότος, "the concrete thing called darkness," and σκοτία, "its abstract quality" (cf. ii. 11); or, as Dr. Westcott defines it, "darkness absolutely, opposed to light," and "darkness realized as a state." The form σκότος occurs only here and in Jn. iii. 19 in the Johannine writings.

οὐ ποιοῦμεν τὴν ἀλήθειαν] Cf. Jn. iii. 21, ὅ δὲ ποιῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν ἔρχεται πρὸς τὸ φῶς, ἵνα φανερωθῇ αὐτοῦ τὰ ἔργα ὧν ἐν θεῷ ἐστὶν εἰργασμένα, where the thoughts of this verse find expression in a positive form. Compare also Neh. ix. 33, ὅτι ἀλήθειαν ἐποίησας: and for the opposite expression, Apoc. xxii. 27, ὁ ποιῶν βδέλυγμα καὶ ψεῦδος: xxii. 15, ὁ φιλῶν καὶ ποιῶν ψεῦδος. To "do the truth," or to "do a lie," are natural expressions in the Johannine system of thought in which ἀλήθεια has a far wider signification than that with which its modern connotation familiarizes us. The Johannine usage corresponds with the meaning of the Hebrew נאש, which denotes reliability, faithfulness, and therefore, when it refers to what is spoken, truth. We may compare the phrases נאש דנא הנוי, Gn. xxiv. 49, xliv. 29; Jos. ii. 14; 2 S. xv. 20; and הניא תַנֶּב, 1 K. ii. 4, iii. 6; 2 K. xx. 3; Is. xxxviii. 3. The "truth" has no exclusive reference to the sphere of the intellect. It expresses that which is highest, most completely in conformity with the nature and will of God, in any sphere of being. In relation to man it has to do with his whole nature, moral and spiritual as well as intellectual. "Speaking" the truth is only one part of "doing" the truth, and not the most important. To "do the truth" is to give expression to the highest of which he is capable in every sphere of his being. It relates to action, and conduct and feeling, as well as to word and thought.
7. "Walking in the light," i.e. the conscious and sustained endeavour to live a life in conformity with the revelation of God, who is "light," especially as that revelation has been made finally and completely in Jesus Christ, is the necessary condition of fellowship. Where this condition is fulfilled, fellowship is real. To claim it is no lie. Comp. "The righteous . . . will live in goodness and righteousness, and will walk in eternal light" (Book of Enoch xcii. 4).

αὐτὸς ἐστιν] The contrast is significant. Men "walk" in light, God "is" in it. Findlay, pp. 100–102.

μετ' ἄλληλων] The strict antithesis to ver. 6, "if we claim fellowship with God, while our conduct does not correspond to the claim, we lie," would naturally be, "if we walk in light we can claim fellowship with God." This has led to the alteration of ἄλληλων in some texts, αὐτοῦ or cum Deo being substituted for it. These readings are clearly attempts at simplification. The writer follows his usual custom. Instead of contenting himself with an exact antithesis, he carries the thought a step further. Fellowship among Christians "shows the reality of that larger spiritual life which is life in God" (Westc.). It is based on fellowship with God, and it is the active realization of that fellowship. As Christians enter into fuller fellowship with each other, the more fully they come to live the life "in God" into which they have been born again. μετ' ἄλληλων cannot mean "we with God, and God with us" (Aug. Ew. etc.), nor can it mean that we share with each other the Divine indwelling (Karl), though mutual fellowship is the first step in the path which leads to that.

καί[.] And where the endeavour to "walk in light" is carried out (it depends on the exercise of man's will whether or not the endeavour is made), the removal of sin, which hinders fellowship with God, is possible in consequence of what the Son of God has gained for men by His human life, the power of which has been set free by death so as to become available for all men.

tὸ αἷμα «.t.A.»] As Westcott has pointed out, the significance of "blood" in Jewish thought is most clearly expressed in Lv. xvii. 11. The blood "atones" through the life which is said to be "in" the blood. The power of Christ's life, freely rendered to God, throughout His life and in His death, and set free by death for wider service than was possible under the limitations of a human life in Palestine at a definite date, is effective for the gradual (καθαρίζει) removal of sin in those who attempt to realize their union with God in Him. The use of καθαρίζει determines the sense to be the removal of sin rather than the cancelling of guilt. As ritual cleanness was the condition of approach to God under the Jewish sacrificial system, so the “blood” of Christ cleans men’s consciences for God’s service and fellowship. See Briggs, The Messiah of the Apostles, p. 469.

καθαρίζει] In the Synoptists the word is used especially of cleansing from leprosy (see also its use in Mt. xxiii. 26, τὸ ἐντὸς: Lk. xi. 39, τὸ ἐξωθεὶν). In the Fourth Gospel it does not occur, but the adjective καθαρός is found in the Discourses of the Upper Room (xiii. 10, 11, xv. 3). In Acts it is used in the sense of “pronouncing clean” (x. 15, xi. 9), and also (xv. 9) with τὰς καρδίας: cf. 2 Co. vii. 1; Eph. v. 26; Tit. ii. 14; He. ix. 14, 22, 23, x. 2; Test. Rub. iv. 8. In the LXX it is found as the equivalent of ἐκλείπην and καθαρόν in the senses (1) to cleanse, (2) to pronounce clean. The present tense may point to the νῦν ἁπαθεία, of which even ὁ λελουμένος has frequent need in his walk through a soiling world (Jn. xii. 10). “Docet hic locus gratuitam peccatorum veniam non semel tantum nobis dari, sed perpetuo in ecclesia residere” (Calvin).

᾿Ιησοῦ τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ] Cf. iv. 15, v. 5; He. iv. 14 (ἀρχιερέα μέγαν... Ἰησοῦν τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ θεοῦ). As man He gained the power to help men. As Son of God His help is effective.

πάσης ἁμαρτίας] Sin in all its forms and manifestations; Mt. xii. 31. Cf. Ja. i. 2, πᾶσα χαρά: Eph. i. 8, πᾶσα σοφία: and for the singular, 1 Jn. iii. 4, 8, 9. The writer is apparently thinking of sin as an active power, showing itself in many forms, rather than of specific acts of sin. Weiss’ interpretation “all sins,” i.e. not only of the pre-Christian period of a man’s life, but also those committed in the course of Christian life, would require the plural. But in general sense it is correct, and rightly throws the emphasis on πάσης, sin in whatsoever form it may manifest itself. Karl’s limitation of the meaning to sins committed before men became Christians (“d. h. von der vor dem Christentum begangenen”), is not justified by the words used by the writer. And the reason suggested, that “post-Christian” sins require also intercession (Johannische Studien, pp. 18, 82), is a curious instance of the perversion of an excellent principle, that of interpreting the Epistle by the help of the Epistle itself.
8. The second false plea denies the abiding power of sin as a principle in one who has committed sins. To those who hold such a view, sin ceases to be of any importance. It is merely a passing incident which leaves behind it no lasting consequences. The plea rests on self-deception. It can only be maintained by those who shut their eyes to the teaching of experience, in themselves or in others. And they lead themselves astray. The consequences must be fatal unless men acknowledge their mistake and retrace their steps.

ἐὰν εἴπωμεν] For the general idea, cf. Pr. xx. 9, τίς παρρησιάσεται καθαρὸς εἶναι ἀπὸ ἁμαρτίων, and xxviii. 13, ὁ ἐπικαλύπτων ἁμαρτίαν ἑαυτοῦ οὐκ εὐοδωθήσεται.

ἁμαρτίαν οὐκ ἔχομεν] Cf. πίστιν ἐχεῖν, to have faith, as an active principle working in us and forming our character. To "have sin" is not merely a synonym for to commit sins. This is necessitated by the contrast demanded by ver. τὸ between ἁμαρτίαν οὐκ ἔχομεν and οὐχ ἡμαρτήκαμεν. "Sin" is the principle of which sinful acts are the several manifestations. So long as a Christian commits sins, sin is an active power working in him; and its power still remains after the forgiveness of sins which he received at his baptism. To deny this is to refuse to accept the teaching of experience.

In the N.T. the use of the phrase ἁμαρτίαν ἔχειν is confined to this Epistle and the Fourth Gospel (ix. 41, xv. 22, 24, xix. 11). The meaning of the phrase in the Gospel has been raised as an objection to the interpretation given above. It is maintained that in the Gospel it has a quite definite sense, and that it specifically denotes the guiltiness of the sin" (Law, The Tests of Life, p. 130); and it is suggested that the meaning here must be, "If we say that we have no guilt, no responsibility for the actions, wrong in themselves, which we have committed." It is probably true that as compared with the simple verb the phrase accentuates the ideas of guilt and responsibility. And in the passages in the Gospel where the phrase occurs these ideas are prominent. But they are contained in the Hebrew conception of sin, emphatically developed in the teaching of the N.T., rather than in the one expression as opposed to the other. He who has committed sin is responsible for his action, just as much as he who "has sin" and who feels, or should feel, in himself the presence of a power which manifests itself in his sinful acts. And though the idea of guilt is prominent in the use of the phrase in the Gospel, especially in xv. 22, where the antithesis, "Now they have no excuse for their sin," must be noticed, it does not exhaust the meaning of the phrase as used there. Cf. ix. 41, εἰ τυφλοὶ ἦτε οὐκ ἂν εἴχετε ἁμαρτίαν. If they had been as ignorant, and conscious of their ignorance, as the man whom they had condemned, they might have learned, and whatever “sin” they had would have lost its power. But their refusal to see the truth when it was presented to them, and their insistence that they knew, in spite of this, gave their sin an abiding power over them. Henceforth it could prevent any possibility of their seeing the truth. And the same idea is present in ch. xv. The rejection of Christ’s words by His opponents had given sin a power over them, which it could never have had but for their missing the opportunity of better things. As it was, they not only had “sin” as an active power established in them and working its will, but they had no excuse to offer for its presence there (πρόφασιν οὐκ ἔχουσιν περὶ τῆς ἁμαρτίας αὐτῶν, which cannot mean “they have no excuse for their guilt,” and which is not merely antithetical but adds a further point). This meaning is especially clear in ver. 24. The “sin” which had got its hold, in consequence of their rejecting Him in spite of what He had done among them, had conceived and brought forth hate (νῦν δὲ καὶ μεμισήκασιν is the contrast to ἁμαρτίαν οὐκ εἶχοσαν). And the phrase may possibly be used with something of the same meaning in xix. 11, δό παραδίδοντι . . . μείζονα ἁμαρτίαν ἔχει, though in this case the simpler meaning “the greater guilt” is more plausible. But even here the thought may be of the power which sin acquires over him who admits it. Sin could now work with more fatal power in the High Priest, who knew the relative power of God and of the Roman governor, and who incited him to his crime against justice, than in Pilate, who in spite of his greater power was more ignorant than the Jew. Even if the phrase meant no more in the Gospel than the denotation of the “guiltiness of the agent,” it would not necessarily bear exactly the same meaning in the Epistle. The writer likes to put new meaning into the phrases he repeats. But probably, though the exact nuance may be different in the two writings, the fundamental idea expressed is the same. It is the special characteristic of the writer that he loves to use his phrases, of which his store is but scanty, with slightly different shades of meaning.

ἐαυτοὺς πλανώμεν] The phrase, as contrasted with the simple πλανώμεθα, emphasizes the agent’s responsibility for the mistake. The evidence is there; only wilful blindness refuses to accept it. We have no excuse for the sin which we “have,” in spite of our denial of the fact. See Findlay, p. 106.

πλανῶν always suggests the idea of leading astray from the right path (cf. ii. 26, iii. 7; Jn. vii. 12; Apos. ii. 20, xii. 9, etc.). The mistake must have fatal consequences until we lead ourselves back into the way of truth.
καὶ ἡ ἀλήθεια κ.τ.λ.] The statement that we have not sin, shows that those who make it have not "truth" working in them as an inner and effective principle. For the meaning of "truth," cf. note on ver. 6. It is more than the sense of truth, uprightness and honesty of self-examination and self-knowledge (cf. Rothe, ad loc.). It can be regarded both objectively and subjectively, either as something that can be done (ver. 6), an external standard in accordance with which actions must be shaped, or as an inner principle, working from within and moulding a man's inner life.

9. The existence of sin, even in those who have entered the Christian community, is a patent fact. But it does not make impossible that fellowship with God which sin interrupts. In those who acknowledge the fact, God has provided for its forgiveness and removal.

πιστὸς καὶ δίκαιος] Not "faithful because He is just," and justice in His relation to men includes the necessity of His fulfilling the promises which He has made. The two adjectives are co-ordinate. God's faithfulness is shown in the fulfilment of His promises. He is just, in that, in spite of men's failures to fulfil their obligations, He remains true to the covenant which He made with them; and this includes forgiveness on certain conditions. It is probable that throughout the Bible this idea of faithfulness to His covenant in spite of man's unfaithfulness, is the primary signification of δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ. Cf. He. x. 23, πιστὸς δὲ ἐπαγγελάμενος, and Ro. iii. 25, εἰς ἐνδείξει τῆς δικαιοσύνης αὐτοῦ διὰ τὴν πάρεσιν τῶν προγεγονότων ἁμαρτημάτων ἐν τῇ ἀνοχῇ τοῦ θεοῦ.

ἵνα] Defines the sphere in which the faithfulness and the justice are shown. In view of the usage of the writer, and the frequency of the definitive ἵνα in papyrus documents, it is difficult to maintain the "telic" force of ἵνα throughout the N.T. It may be worth while to collect (roughly) the passages in the Johannine books where the "telic" force has given way to the definitive: Jn. i. 27, ἄξιος ἵνα λύσω: ii. 25, οὐ χρείαν εἶχεν ἵνα τινὰ διδωκαί: iv. 47, ἣ ἀγαπή ἵνα καταβῇ: v. 7, ἀνθρωπον ὅπως ἤτοι ἵνα βάλῃ: vi. 29, τοῦτο ἵνα τὸ ἔργον ἵνα πιστεύῃ: 39, τοῦτο ἵνα τὸ θέλημα ἵνα ἐίσαυρος: vii. 50, ἧγαλλιάσατο ἵνα ἰδῇ: ix. 22, συνετέθη ἵνα ἀποθάνῃ: x. 57, ἐδώκεσαν ἵνα ἁμαρτῶν:
THE EPISTLES OF S. JOHN

20

xii. 23, ἐλήλυθεν ἡ ὥρα ἵνα δοξασθῇ: xiii. 1, ἦλθεν αὐτῷ ἡ ὥρα ἵνα μεταβῇ: 2, βεβληκότος εἰς τὴν καρδίαν ἵνα παραιτῇ: 29, λέγει αὐτῷ... ἵνα δῷ: 34, ἐντολὴν καὶ ἐντολήν δίδωμι ἵνα ἀγαπάτε: xv. 12, αὕτη ἐστὶν ἡ ἐντολή... ἵνα ἀγαπᾶτε: 13, μείζονα ταύτης... ἵνα... τὴν ψυχὴν... θῇ: xvi. 2, ἐρχεται ὡρα ἵνα τὰς ἀποκτείναις ὑπᾶς δύνη: 7, συμφέρει... ἵνα... ἀπέλθω: 30, οὐ χρείαν ἐχεις ἵνα... ἐρωτᾶ: 32, ἔρχεται ὡρα καὶ ἐλήλυθεν ἵνα σκορπισθῆτε: xvii. 3, αὕτη ἐστὶν ἡ άγιοις ἡ ἑωθιν... ἵνα γίνωσκωσιν: 15, ἐρωτῶ ἵνα ἀρῆτος: 24, θέλω ἵνα... ἵνα: xviii. 39, ἐστὶ δὲ συνήθεια... ἵνα... ἀπολύσω: xix. 31, ἐρωτήσαν... ἵνα κατεγώσαν: 38, ἐρωτήσαν... ἵνα ἀρῇ: 1 Jno. 27, οὐ χρείαν ἐχετ ἵνα τις δέσω: iii. 1, ποταπὴν ἀγάπην δέδωκεν... ἵνα κληθῶσιν: 11, αὕτη ἐστὶν ἡ ἀγαπὴ... ἵνα ἀγαπῶμεν: 23, αὕτη ἐστὶν ἡ ἐντολή ἀντί τινι τετελείωσεν: 17, εν τούτω τετελείωσα... ἵνα παραδοῦσιν: 21, ταύτῃ τῇ τὴν ἐντολὴν ἐχομεν... ἵνα... ἀγαπᾶ: ν. 3, αὐτῇ ἐστὶν ἡ ἁγάπη... ἵνα... τηρῶμεν: 16, οὐ... λέγω ἵνα ἐρωτήσῃ: 2 Jno. 6, αὕτῃ ἐστὶν ἡ ἁγάπη... ἵνα περιπατήσωμεν: 2, αὐτῇ ἐστὶν ἡ ἐντολή... ἵνα περιβάληται: 3 Jno. 4, μειζοτέραν τούτων οὐκ ἔχω χαράν, ἵνα ἄκουων. Αρος. vi. 11, ἐρρέθη αὐτοίς ἵνα ἀναπαύσωσι: xiii. 12, ποιεῖ... ἵνα προσκυνήσωσιν: 13, ποιεῖ σημεῖα μεγάλα, ἵνα πῦρ ποιῇ... καταβαίνειν: 15, ποιεῖ [να]... ἀποκτανθῶσιν: 16, ποιεῖ πάντας... ἵνα δῶσιν αὐτοῖς [και] ἵνα μὴ τις δύνηται ἀγοράσατι: xix. 8, ἐδόθη αὐτῇ ἵνα περιβάληται. Though a few of them might possibly be interpreted differently, there is abundant evidence to establish the usage.

ἀφῇ] The determination of the meaning of this word from the sense of “send away” is tempting but unsound. Those who can remember the light which was thrown, at least for themselves, on the whole subject of forgiveness, by F. D. Maurice’s insistence on the view that ἀφιέναι means to “send away,” and not to let off a penalty or to cancel a debt, will always be grateful for what he said on the subject. But though right in substance, it must be confessed that linguistically his interpretation cannot be defended. The application of the word to “sin” is almost certainly suggested by the metaphor of the remission or cancelling of debts. At the same time it must be remembered that, as in the case of most metaphorical expressions which are used to emphasize some particular point of similarity, in respect of which comparison is possible, it is confusing to transfer all the associations of the metaphor to the new subject which it is used to illustrate. As applied to “sins” it suggests the cancelling of the outstanding debt, the removal of that barrier to intercourse between man and God which is set up by sin. And the transaction must be real and not imaginary. God cannot treat it as non-existent, unless it has been actually or potentially removed or destroyed. ἀφιέναι is used in the N.T. in the sense of “remission” in the following passages: with ὀφείλημα or ὀφειλή, Mt. vii. 12, xviii. 32; with παράπτωμα, Mt. vi. 14, 15; Mk. xi. 26; with ἀμαρτία or ἀμάρτημα, Mt. ix. 2, 5, 6, xii. 31; Mk. ii. 5, 7, 9, 10, iii. 28, iv. 12; Lk. v. 20, 21, 23, 24, vii. 47-49, xi. 4, cf. xvii. 3, 4; Jn. xx. 23; Ja. v. 15; 1 Jn. ii. 12; with τὸ δάνιον, Mt. xviii. 27; without a direct object (or subject), Mt. xii. 32, xviii. 21, 35; Lk. xxiii. 34, also in Mk. xii. 25, Lk. xii. 10; with ἡ ἐπίνοια τῆς καρδίας, Ac. viii. 22; with ἁμαρτία, Ro. iv. 7 (=Ps. xxxii. 1). The use of κρατεῖν in Jn. xx. 23 must be interpreted in the light of this usage of ἀφιέναι.

It stands by itself in the N.T.

καθαρίσῃ . . . ἀδικίας] Cf. Jer. xl. 8, καὶ καθαρίσῃ αὐτοὺς ἀπὸ τῶν ἅμαρτῶν αὐτῶν ἐν ἡμῖν ἀφιέναις μοι. In ἀφιέναι the metaphor is borrowed from the cancelling of debt, but the idea which the metaphor is used to illustrate is ethical. There is therefore no need to equate the meaning of καθαρίζειν to that of ἀφιέναι. It should certainly be interpreted in an ethical sense.

πάσης ἁμαρτίας] Cf. ἀδικίας. Injustice in whatever form it may manifest itself. ἁμαρτία denotes injustice, failure to maintain right relations with other men or with God. If God is faithful to forgive sins according to His promise, He is also “just,” not only to fulfil the terms of His covenant, but also to provide for the cleansing or removal of those injustices of which men have been guilty in their relations with God or with other men.

The third false plea is the denial of the fact of having committed sin. Though a man may allow the abiding power of sin as a principle in those who have sinned, or the existence of sin in Christians after forgiveness, he may yet deny that he has himself sinned. To do so is to deny the truth of God’s revelation. Apart from actual statements in Scripture (cf. Ps. xiii. (xiv.) 3, lii. (lili.) 2), the whole plan of God’s dealings with men is based on the assumption that all have sinned. To deny the fact in our own case is to make Him a liar, since it is implied in His whole message to us. His word can have no place in the development of our being. ψεύστην] Cf. Jn. viii. 44, 55; 1 Jn. ii. 4, 22, iv. 20. And for the exact phrase, 1 Jn. v. 10.

δ λόγος] Like the truth, the word can be viewed objectively or subjectively, an external message or an inward force effective and active in men. There is, of course, no reference to the personal Logos, though the word implies a more personal relationship than ἀλήθεια. It suggests the speaker. Cf. Jn. viii. 37, δ λόγος δ ἐμὸς οὐ χωρεῖ ἐν ὑμῖν: He. iv. 12; Ja. i. 21; 1 Jn. ii. 14.

(b) ii. 1-6. Further statement of the conditions of fellowship. Knowledge and obedience.

1, 2. The remedy for sin (in the case of those who acknowledge that they have sinned, in contrast with i. 10).

3-5a. Obedience the sign of knowledge.

5b, 6. Imitation the sign of union.

1. The recognition of the universality of sin, from which even Christians are not actually free, might lead to a misconception of its true character. Men might easily pass too lenient judgments on its heinousness, and ignore the responsibility of those who give way to its promptings. If it is impossible for any one, even the Christian, to escape sin, why condemn with such uncompromising severity failures for which men cannot reasonably be held responsible? Why strive so earnestly against what is inevitable? The writer hastens to warn his readers against such conclusions. Sin is wholly antagonistic to the Christian ideal; his whole object in trying to set out that ideal more clearly is to prevent sin, not to condone it. His aim in writing is to bring about "sinlessness" (ἵνα μὴ δυσπρτυνέ). And the Christian scheme includes means by which such an aim may be gradually realized. Whenever any one gives way to any act of sin, such as must interrupt the intercourse and fellowship between men and God, which it is the great aim of Christ's work to establish, the means exist by which this fellowship may be restored. Christians have an "advocate" with the Father (πρὸς : cf. i. 2), who is able and willing to plead their cause, to present their case truly and completely, to transact their business, to speak for them, if non-legal phrases convey the meaning more clearly. And His mediation is addressed to one who is Father of both Advocate and suppliants, as eager as they can be that the fellowship should be restored, on the only terms on which such fellowship can be restored, the removal of the sin which has interrupted it.

τεκνία μου] The "Elder," who is perhaps the representative of a generation which has almost passed away, naturally thinks of the younger generation to whom he is speaking as his "children."
And when he wishes to emphasize the importance of the thought which he has to teach, he naturally falls into the language of affectionate endearment. Whether he is thinking of them as his “sons in the faith,” who owe their conversion to Christianity to his ministry, is uncertain. We do not know the historical circumstances of the case with sufficient accuracy to determine.

tαῦτα[ must refer to the contents of the whole Epistle, already present to the mind of the writer, rather than to the preceding chapter or any part of it, though to some extent the main teaching of the Epistle has been already declared in outline.

τὰ μὴ ἁμάρτητε] The aorist suggests definite acts of sin rather than the habitual state, which is incompatible with the position of Christians who are in truth what their name implies. Those who are bathed need not save to wash their feet; cf. Jn. xiii. 10.

καὶ ἐὰν] The sentence introduced by these words is not contrasted with the preceding, but added to it “as a continuous piece of one message.” The writer’s object is to produce “sinlessness.” And this is not a fruitless aspiration after an ideal which cannot possibly be realized, for the means of dealing with the sin which he desires to combat are at hand.

παράκλητος] Most of the information which is of real importance in determining the meaning and usage of this word in the Johannine writings (it is not found elsewhere in the N.T.) is to be found in the notes of Wettstein and Westcott. The article on the word in Hastings’ Dictionary of the Bible (iii. 665) gives a very clear summary of the evidence; cf. also Jülicher’s shorter statement in the Encyclopaedia Biblica (iii. 3567).

The passages where it occurs in the N.T. are Jn. xiv. 16, 26, xv. 26, xvi. 7; 1 Jn. ii. 1. The meaning “advocate” is clearly needed in the Epistle, it is possible in xv. 26, and probable in xvi. 7. In xiv. 16, 26 it must have the wider and less technical meaning of one called in to help.

As regards the use of the verb παρακαλεῖν, it has the sense of comfort in the LXX (cf. Gn. xxxviii. 35, where it is used with reference to Jacob) and in the N.T. (cf. Mt. v. 4, διο αὐτοὶ παρακληθήσονται, where the influence of Is. lxi. 2, παρακαλέσαι πάντας τοὺς πενθοῦντας, is clear). The use of παρακλήσεις in the sense of comfort is also well established (cf. 2 Co. i. 3, 4, διὰ τῆς παρακλήσεως ἡς παρακαλούμεθα). But its original meaning was to send for, summon to one’s aid, corresponding to the Latin advocare. The following passages are often quoted: Xen. Anab. i. 6, 5, Κλέαρχον παρεκάλεσε σύμβουλον, ὥς ... ἐδοκεὶ τροτιμηθῆναι μάλιστα τῶν Ῥωμαίων: Aesch. Clis. 200, τί δεὶ σε Δήμοσθένην παρακαλεῖν; ὅταν παρακαλήσῃ κακουργόν ἀνθρωπον καὶ τεχνίτην λόγον κλέπτεις τῇν ἀκρόασιν. With this corresponds the classical use of the word παράκλητος. It is used as an adjective; cf. Dion. Cass. xlv. 20, τὴν ἀγοράν ... δούλων παρακλήτων πληρώσας, but more often absolutely; cf. Demosthenes, de falsa legatione, 341, αἱ τῶν παρακλήτων αὐταὶ δείσεις καὶ σπουδαὶ τῶν ἰδίων πλεονεξίων εἴνεκα γίγνονται. Diogenes Laertius, iv. 7, Bion. πρὸ τὸν ἀδικωμένον ἄρετα συλλαβεῖς τὸ ἱκανόν σοι ποιήσω, έαν παρακλήντος πέμψῃς καὶ μή αὐτὸς ἔλθῃς. The meaning of the word is thus clearly wider than that of "advocate" in English. Though it is used specially in connection with the law courts, it denotes any friend called upon to give help, either by pleading or giving evidence, or in virtue of his position and power. Its Latin equivalent is "aduocatus," rather than "patronus," which corresponds more in meaning to our "advocate." The distinction is clearly defined by Asconius Pedianus, in a note on Cicero, in Q. Caecilium, "Qui defendit alterum in iudicio, aut patronus dicitur, si orator est, aut aduocatus si aut ius suggerit, aut praesentiam suam commodat amico."

The form of the word is passive (cf. κλητός, ἐκλεκτός, ἁγαπητός, etc.). It must mean one who is called to the side of the suppliant, not one who comforts or consoles, or exhorts. The meaning "comforter" or "consoler" can attach to the word only in so far as that expresses the good office which he who is called in performs for the friend who claims his help.

The usage of the Septuagint corresponds. In Zec. i. 13, παρακλητικός is used to translate the Hebrew שֵׁם, βέβαια καλά καὶ λόγους παρακλητικούς. In Job xvi. 2, תנן is translated by παρακλήτωρ (παρακλήτωρες κακών πάντες). But it should be noticed that two of the later versions (Aquila, Theodotion) render it by παράκλητοι. Symmachos has παρηγοροῦντες, an indication that in later Greek the meaning of παράκλησις was beginning to influence that of παράκλητος.

Philo's usage corresponds with the classical. The Paraclete is the advocate or intercessor; cf. de Josepho, c. 40, ἀμνηστικάν ἀπάντων παρέχω τῶν εἰς ἐμὲ πεπραγμένων μηδένος ἐκείνω δείσθε παρακλήτου: de Vita Moysis, iii. 14, the High Priest is said rightly to bear the symbol of the Logos (τὸ λογεῖον is the LXX expression for the breast-plate), ἀναγκαίως γὰρ τῶν ἱερομένων τοῦ τῶν κόσμων πατρὶ παρακλήτωρ χρῆσαι τελειοτάτῳ τὴν ἁμαρτίαν καὶ χορηγίαν ἀφθονωτάτων ἀγαθῶν, where the parallel to the Johannine thought is clearly marked, whether the Cosmos or the Logos is to be regarded as the "son perfect in virtue" who is used as Paraclete. In another passage usually quoted, de Opificio Mundi, c. 6, οὕτω δὲ παρακλήτῳ τῆς γὰρ ἕνεκεν ἐπεί οὐκ ἐνεχθεῖσα μόνω δὲ οὕτω χρησάμενος ἥθελεν ἐγνώσει ἐνεχθεῖσα τὴν ... φύσιν, Jülicher may be right in saying that the only feasible meaning is something like “instructor,” “adviser,” so far as concerns the duty which the Paraclete is needed to perform; but the point of the sentence is that God confers His benefits on nature Himself, without using the help or services of another. Cf. also In Flaccum, §§ 3, 4.

The word occurs as a loan-word in the Targum and Talmudic literature, in the sense of helper, intercessor, advocate. It is used in the Targum on Job xvi. 20 and xxxiii. 23 as a paraphrase of παράκλητος taken in the sense of “interpreter.” The latter passage is especially interesting, as showing the late Jewish view of the need of angelic agency to “redeem a man from going to the pit.”

In the Talmud, παράκλητος is used for “advocate,” in opposition to ἔπικτηρ (κατήγορος; cf. Apoc. xii. 10, δ' κατήγωρ). “He who performs one precept has gotten to himself one paraclete, and he who commits one transgression has gotten to himself one accuser” (Pirke Aboth, iv. 15; Taylor, p. 69). “Whosoever is summoned before the court for capital punishment is saved only by powerful paracletes; such paracletes man has in repentance and good works; and if there are nine hundred and ninety-nine accusers, and only one to plead for his exoneration, he is saved” (Shab. 32a). The sin-offering is like the paraclete before God; it intercedes for man, and is followed by another offering, a thank-offering for the pardon obtained (Sifra, Megora iii. 3). These and other passages are quoted in the Jewish Encyclopaedia, s.v. (ix. 515). The same usage is found in early Christian literature, where the use of the word is independent of the Johannine use of the term; cf. 2 Clement. vi. 9, τίς ἡμῶν παράκλητος ἔσται ἐὰν μὴ εὑρεθῶμεν ἔργα ἔχοντες ὅσια καὶ δίκαια; Barnabas, c. xx. καταπονοῦντες τὸν θλιβόμενον, πλούσιων παράκλητοι, πενήτων ἄνομοι κριταί.

The connection of the word with the ordinary meaning of παράκλητος is found in Rufinus’ translation of the De Principiis; cf. ii. 7. 3, “Paracletus uero quod dicitur Spiritus sanctus, a consolatione dicitur. Paraclesis enim Latine consolatio appellatur.” He goes on to suggest that the word may have a different meaning when applied to the Holy Spirit and to Christ. “Videtur enim de Salvatore Paracletus dici deprecator. Utrumque enim significat in Graeco Paracletus, et deprecator et consolatorem.”

Origen seems to have understood the word in the sense of “intercessor.” Cf. Comm. in Joann. i. 38, τὴν περὶ ἡμῶν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα προστασίαν αὐτοῦ δηλοὶ παρακαλοῦντος ὑπὲρ τῆς ἀνθρώπων φύσεως καὶ ἱλάσκομένου, ὡς δ' παράκλητος καὶ ἱλασμός.

In Chrysostom it has the sense of “comforter,” Hom. in Jo. 75, ἐπειδὴ γὰρ οὐδὲπώ αὐτὸν ἐγνωκότας εἰκὸς ἦν σφόδρα ἐπιζητεῖν τὴν συνουσίαν ἐκείνην, τὰ ῥήματα, τὴν κατὰ σάρκα αὐτοῦ παρουσίαν, καὶ μηδεμίαν δέχεσθαι παραμυθίαν ἀπόντος τί φησιν; ἐρωτήσω τὸν πατέρα καὶ ἄλλον παράκλητον δώσει υἱῶν τουτέστιν ἄλλον ὡς ἐμὲ.

In Cyril of Jerusalem the sense is not limited to that of "comforting"; cf. Catechesis, xvi. 20, Παράκλητος δὲ καλεῖται, διὰ τὸ παρακαλεῖν καὶ παραμυθεῖσαι καὶ συναντιλαμβάνεσαι τῆς ἀσθενείας ἡμῶν: Ro. viii. 26 being quoted in support, with the explanation of ἐπερευνάχαις "δῆλον δὲ ὅτι πρὸς τὸν θεόν."

The evidence of the old Latin Version is similar. In the Epistle "aduocatus" is used, in the Gospel either "aduocatus" or "paraclitus." This is not seriously affected by the evidence adduced by Rönsch (Itala u. Vulgata, p. 348), that "aduocare" acquired the meaning of "to comfort" (cf. Tertullian, adv. Max. iv. 14, where the παρακαλεῖσαι τοῖς πενθοῦσιν of Is. lxii. 2 is translated "aduocare" lanquantes). "Advocare" is a natural translation of παρακαλεῖν (cf. Tert. Pudicit. 13; Iren. iii. ix. 3, v. xv. 1, and the Vulgate of Is. xl. 2, quoted by Rönsch), and owes any connection with the idea of "comforting" that it may have to that fact. Augustine's "Paracletus, id est Consolator," throws no light on the meaning and usage of the Greek word. The other versions do not throw much light on the subject. In Siyric, Arabic, Aethiopic, and Bohairic it is transliterated, and in the Sahidic also in the Gospel, while it has "he that prayeth for us" in the Epistle. The Vulgate has "Paracletus" in the Gospel and "Aduocatus" in the Epistle. This, no doubt, influenced the modern versions. Wycliffe renders "Comforter" in the Gospel and "Advocate" in the Epistle; and Luther also has "Tröster" in the Gospel and "Fürsprecher" in the Epistle.

Thus the evidence of early use supports the evidence of the form of the word, which is naturally passive. Its meaning must be "one called to the side of" him who claims the services of the called. The help it describes is generally assistance of some sort or other in connection with the courts of law; but it has a wider signification also,—the help of any one who "lends his presence" to his friend. Any kind of help, of advocacy, intercession, or mediation may be suggested by the context in which it is used. In itself it denotes merely "one called in to help." In the Epistle the idea of one who pleads the Christian's cause before God is clearly indicated, and "advocate" is the most satisfactory translation. This sense suits some of the passages in which it is used in the Gospel; in the others it suggests one who can be summoned to give the help that is needed in a wider sense. There is no authority for the sense of "Comforter," either in the sense of "strengthenor" or "consoler," which has been so generally connected with it in consequence of the influence of Wycliffe and Luther, except Patristic interpretations of its meaning in S. John.
The suggestion of Zimmern (Vater, Sohn, u. Fürsprecher in der babylonischen Gottesvorstellung), that its use in Christian and Jewish thought may be connected with the Babylonian myth of the intervention of Nusku (the Fire God), who “acts as the advocate of men at the instance of Ea and Marduk,” has not been favourably received. So far as concerns the Johannine use of the term Paraclete, far simpler explanations are to be found in its use in Philo and Rabbinic Judaism. In reality it hardly needs explanation. It was probably a common word, and the obvious one to use. Moulton and Milligan (Expositor, vol. x., 1910) quote the illustrations of its use, one from “a very illiterate letter” of the second century A.D. where it has been restored (BU 60112), καὶ τὸν ἀραβῶνα τοῦ Σαραπίωνος παρακλος (l. παράκλητος) δέδωκα αὐτῷ, where they suggest that it may mean “on being summoned,” and an instance of the use of ἀπαράκλητος, OGIS 24825 (175-161 B.C.), ἀπαράκλητος.

Deissmann (Licht von Osten, p. 243, n. 1) lays stress on the use of the word in Aramaic as a proof of its frequency in vulgar Greek. Its use in the Targums and Talmudic Literature is important. The extent of the author’s acquaintance with Rabbinic thought is at last beginning to be recognized.

ἔχομεν] Augustine’s comment is worth quoting, “Maluit se ponere in numero peccatorum ut haberet aduocatum Christum, quam ponere se pro Christo aduocatum et inueniri inter damnandos superbos.” As frequently the writer identifies himself with the rest of the Christian Body. They actually possess and have experience of the means, which are potentially available for the whole world. And the need is felt by the whole Church, not because any of them might, but whenever any one does fall.
The lapse of one is a matter which concerns the whole body (ἐάν τις . . . ἔχομεν).

Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν δίκαιον] As true man (Ἰησοῦν), He can state the case for men with absolute knowledge and real sympathy.
As God’s anointed messenger to men (Χριστόν), He is naturally fitted for the task and acceptable to Him before whom He pleads. As δίκαιος He can enter the Presence from which all sin excludes. He needs no advocate for Himself. Comp.
Book of Enoch xxxviii. 2, liii. 6, where the Messiah is called “the Righteous One.”

και] om. boh-codd.
εαν τις αμαρτη] si peccetis, arm-codd.
Ἰησοῦν Χριστον] post δίκαιον 7a 192 (318).
Χριστον] om. 1b 161a (173). + Dominium nostrum et boh-cod.
"Himself is a propitiation for our sins." His advocacy is valid, because He can Himself bear witness that the only condition on which fellowship between God and man can be restored has actually been fulfilled, i.e. the removal of the sin by which the intercourse was interrupted. He is not only the High Priest, duly qualified to offer the necessary propitiation, but also the propitiation which He offers. The writer's meaning is most safely determined by reference to Old Testament theories of sacrifice, or rather of propitiation. In spite of the absence of direct quotations, there can be no doubt that the author of this Epistle is greatly indebted to the Old Testament. If the hand is the hand of a Hellene, it expresses the thought of a Jew. His mind is steeped in the thoughts of the Old Testament. Though he has lived among Greeks and learned to express himself simply in their language, and to some extent has made himself acquainted with Hellenic thought, he is really as much a stranger and a sojourner among them as his fathers were. He may have some acquaintance with Gnostic theories of redemption, which Greek thought had been borrowing from the East from at least the beginning of the century before Christ, his own thoughts on the subject are the outcome of his knowledge of the Scriptures. His views on propitiation therefore, as on all other subjects, must be considered in the light of the Old Testament.

The object of propitiation in Jewish thought, as shown in their Scriptures, is not God, as in Greek thought, but man, who has estranged himself from God, or the sins which have intervened between him and his God. They must be "covered" before right relations can be restored between the Deity and His worshippers. This is the dominant thought in the sacrificial system of the priestly code. It is the natural outcome of the sufferings of the nation before and during the Exile which had deepened their sense of sin, and of Jehovah's estrangement from His people. The joyous sacrificial feast which the Deity shares with His worshippers consequently gives place, in national thought and feeling, to the ritual of the day of Atonement and the whole system of sin-, trespass-, and guilt-offering. Both ideas, the sacrificial feast which forms the ground of closer union between God and men, and the propitiatory offering by means of which interrupted relations can be restored, have, of course, their counterpart in Christian thought and teaching. But it is the latter which dominates the writer's thought here, in an age in which failure and disappointment are fast clouding the clearer vision of God. The dominant idea which is common both to the Old Testament type and the Christian counterpart is that of the absolute holiness of God, who dwells in the light to which no man can approach, till he has put away the sin which cannot enter the presence of God. So far as the means are concerned, the ceremonial has given way to the spiritual. The work of the Christ, who in His life and death freely and voluntarily offered Himself in complete surrender to the will of God and the work of righteousness, has made possible the removal of the sin which keeps men from God. So far as they attach themselves to Him their sins are covered, for the possibility of their final removal is assured.

3. The author has stated that his object in writing is to produce sinlessness, and that if sin intervenes to interrupt the fellowship between man and God, there is a remedy (vv. 1, 2). He now proceeds to point out the signs of Christian life, as realized in knowledge of God and union with God. They are to be found in obedience and in Christ-like conduct. Knowledge of God includes, of course, much more than obedience to His commands, but its genuineness and reality can be thus tested. The writer can conceive of no real knowledge of God which does not issue in obedience, wherever the Divine will has been revealed in definite precepts.

In the Johannine system, “knowledge” is never a purely intellectual process. It is acquired by the exercise of all the faculties of intellect, heart, and will. Fellowship and acquaintance are its cognate ideas. It is developed in the growing experience of intercourse. This conception, which dominates the whole Old Testament idea of “knowing God” and of God “knowing” men (cf. Am. iii. 2), is similarly developed in S. Paul’s “knowing God, or rather being known of Him” (Gal. iv. 9). The stress laid in the Johannine writings on the true knowledge of God is certainly connected with the necessity which the author felt of combating certain stages of Gnostic thought. But to see in the language of this and other similar verses of this Epistle any necessary reference to the particular stage of second-century Gnosticism which immediately preceded the more definite systems of Marcion and Valentinus, is precarious. We know too little about the development of Gnostic ideas before Basilides to say either that the stage of Gnosticism implied in the Fourth Gospel had or had not been reached by the year

1 “Dei cognitio res est efficax. Neque enim nuda imaginatione cognoscitur Deus, sed quum se intus cordibus nostris per Spiritum patefacit” (Calvin).
A.D. or before that date, or that a considerable number of years must have passed before the Church could have demanded so definite a break with opinions of this kind as is suggested in the Second and Third Epistles (cf. Schmiedel, Evangelium, Briefe und Offenbarung Johannis, pp. 38, 19).

ἐν τούτῳ points forward, as usually. Cf. note on i. 4.

γινώσκομεν, ἐγνώκαμεν] The tenses are significant. We learn to perceive more and more clearly that our knowledge is genuine through its abiding results in a growing willingness to obey.

τὰς ἐντολὰς αὐτοῦ τηρῶμεν] The phrase τηρεῖν τὰς ἐντολὰς (τὸν λόγον) is characteristic of the Johannine books, including the Apocalypse. It occurs in the Gospel 12 times, in the First Epistle 6, and in the Apocalypse 6 (cf. also Apoc. i. 3, τὰ ἐν αὐτῷ γεγραμμένα). Elsewhere it is found only in Mt. xix. 17, εἰ δὲ θέλεις εἰς τὴν ζωὴν εἰσελθεῖν, τηρεῖ τὰς ἐντολὰς. Cf. Mk. vii. 9 (τὴν παράδοσιν); 1 Ti. vi. 14, τηρήσαι σε τὴν ἐντολὴν ἄσπιλον. Cf. also Sifre, Deut. 48, quoted by Schlatter (Sprache u. Heimat des 4ten Evangeliums). “When a man keeps the ways of the law, should he sit still and not do them? Rather shouldest thou turn to do them.” As opposed to φυλάσσειν (custodire), τηρεῖν (observare) denotes sympathetic obedience to the spirit of a command, rather than the rigid carrying out of its letter. We may contrast Mk. x. 20, ταῦτα πάντα ἐφυλάξαμην ἐκ νεότητός μου (=Lk. xviii. 21, ἐφύλαξα). As knowledge is not confined to the intellect, so obedience penetrates beyond the latter to the spirit. It may be noticed that the Vulgate has observare in this verse, custodire in ver. 4, and servare in 5, facts which suggest that no Latin rendering was felt to be an exact equivalent, or completely satisfactory rendering, of the Greek word τηρεῖν. In the Gospel servare is the regular rendering.

τὰς ἐντολὰς] The various commands, or definite precepts, in which those parts of the whole θέλημα which are known to us have found expression.

καί om. I* 397 ff (96).

γινώσκομεν] γινωσκωμεν Λ: cognoscemus boh-ed.

τηρομεν] φυλαξωμεν Ν*: τηρησομεν H 88 (Φ).

4. The test is adequate, and may be applied with certainty; for there is no such thing as knowledge which does not issue in corresponding action. The man who claims to have knowledge of God which does not carry with it as its necessary consequence the attempt to carry out His will, thereby declares himself a liar. There is no room for self-deception. The falsehood, if not conscious and deliberate, is without excuse. For the converse thought, that the doing of the will leads to fuller knowledge, cf. Jn. vii. 17.
The verse is closely parallel to i. 6, 8, 10. The form of expression is more individualized than the conditional sentences used there. It is the direct and definite statement of the writer conscious of the fact that he is dealing with a real danger, and probably with a statement that has been actually made, by men against whose influence he is trying to guard his τεκνία. If there is no reason to see in it an attack on any particular Gnostic teacher, it clearly deals with statements which they have heard, and to which they have shown themselves ready to listen.

ψεύστης ἐστίν] The falseness of the claim is the point which is emphasized. At the same time the form of expression chosen declares its inexcusableness. Contrast i. 8 (ἐαντούς πλανώμεν). As compared with the verb (i. 6, ψευδόμεθα), it may perhaps suggest that the statement is a revelation of the character of the man who makes it. "The whole character is false" (Westcott). He who claims knowledge without obedience "has" the sin which he has allowed to gain foothold. If light is seen and not followed, deterioration of character is the inevitable result.

καὶ . . . ἐστίν] The antithetical clause is not merely a repetition of the positive statement in a negative form. The "truth" is regarded by the writer as an active principle working in a man. It is not concerned with the intellect alone. It corresponds to the highest effort of man's whole nature. Cf. Jn. viii. 32.

ἐν τούτῳ] In such an one. In the Gospel and Epistles of S. John, when οὗτος refers back, it always denotes the subject or object, as previously described; cf. Jn. i. 2 (οὗτος, the Logos who is θεός), v. 38, τούτῳ οὖν πιστεύετε (One sent by God).

5. Again the thought is carried further in the statement of the opposite. The whole word is substituted for the definite precepts, and knowledge gives way to love. Perfect obedience gains the whole prize. For love is greater than knowledge.

δς δ᾽ ἂν τηρή] The statement is made in its most general form. Contrast the preceding verse, and i. 6 ff. The difference shows that the writer has in view definite "Gnostic" claims. Knowledge is not the possession of a few "pneumatic" individuals. In contrast with the claim of such an one, whose conduct shows the falsity of his claim, is set the possibility of obtaining the higher prize, the perfection of love, open to all who are willing to obey. The “chance o’ the prize of learning love” is not reserved to the few who think that they “know.”

αὐτοῦ τὸν λόγον] The order of the words throws the emphasis on αὐτοῦ, which takes up the αὐτόν of the Gnostic’s claim. The teaching of the God, whom he claims to know, is very different from the views expressed in his claim.

The λόγος is the sum of the ἐντολαί, or rather it is the whole of which they are the parts. Love is not made perfect in a series of acts of obedience to so many definite commands. It reaches its full growth only when God’s whole plan is welcomed and absorbed. The ἐντολαί offer adequate tests of the truth or falsehood of any claim to know God. But something more is needed before Obedience can have her perfect work.

ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ] The love of God has been interpreted in three ways, according as the genitive is regarded as subjective, objective, or qualitative; God’s love for us, or our love for God, or the love which is characteristic of Him, which “answers to His nature” and which when “communicated to man is effective in him towards the brethren and towards God Himself.” The second gives the simplest and most natural meaning to the words in their present context. The love for God of which man is capable is only fully realized in absolute obedience. At the same time we must remember that it is the teaching of the author that it is God’s love for men which calls out the response of man’s love for Him. “We love Him, because He first loved us.” Comp. ii. 15, iii. 17, iv. 12, v. 3.

ἀληθῶς] The true state of the case as contrasted with the false plea set up by the man who claims to have knowledge without obedience. The emphatic position, however, of the word suggests that it may reasonably be regarded as one of the many signs which are to be found in this Epistle, that the writer feels strongly the need of encouraging his readers with the assurance of the reality of their Christian privileges. Certainty is within their grasp if they will use the means which have been placed at their disposal. Comp. Jn. viii. 31.

5b, 6. Imitation the sign of Union.

The test of union with God is the imitation of His Son. This is not stated directly, as in the case of knowledge (ver. 3), but the claim to “abide in Him” is said to carry with it the moral obligation to “follow the blessed steps of His most holy life.” See Findlay, p. 149.

ἐν αὐτῷ μένει] This form of expression is peculiar to the Johannine writings (Gospel and First Epistle). It is the equivalent, in his system of thought, of the Pauline ἐν Χριστῷ εἶναι, of which it was a very natural modification, if it is to be attributed to the author, and not to his Master. The longer the Lord delayed His coming, the more it came to be realized that union with Christ under the conditions of earthly existence must be an abiding rather than a short tarrying. The idea had taken its new shape before the “last hour” was thought to have struck. Bengel points out a climax: cognitio (ver. 3), communio (5), constantia (6).

ἐκεῖνος] For the use of ἐκεῖνος with reference to Christ, cf. 1 Jn. iii. 3, 5, 7, 16, iv. 17; Jn. vii. 11, xix. 21, ix. 12, 28, and perhaps also xix. 35 (Zahn, Einleitung, ii. 481; cf. Introd. p. iv).

περιπατεῖν] See note on i. 6. For its use in the Johannine writings, cf. Jn. viii. 12, xi. 9f., xii. 35; 1 Jn. i. 6, 7, ii. 11; 2 Jn. 4, 6; 3 Jn. 3, 4.

ev toutw] post θεου P 31: om. H 85 (N) (?) (cf. Tisch. ver. 4) Ie 116*
(-).

γνωσκεῖν] cognoscens, boh-ed.

καθὼς . . . περιπατεῖν] sic ambulare sicut (+et codd.) ille ambulauit, arm.

καὶ . . . περιπατεῖν] om. L.

ousw N C K P al. pler. cat. cop. syr arm. Salv. Thphyl. Oec.] om. AB 3. 34. 65. 81. 180 dscr vg. sah. aeth. Clem. Or. Cyr. Cyp. Aug. The omission may possibly be due to the similarity of the preceding word, but the evidence against it is very strong.

2. ii. 7-17. Proof of the ethical thesis from the circumstances in which the readers find themselves, and from their previous experience. The old commandment is always new in the growing light of God’s revelation. “Walking in light” and “keeping the commandments” further defined as love of the brethren.

(a) 7-11. General. Brotherly love.
(b) 12-17. Individual. Warning against love of the world.

7-8. The Commandment, old and new.

It is hardly necessary to discuss the interpretations which regard the “old” and the “new” as different commandments, the old commandment being the injunction to “walk as He walked,” and the new, the call to brotherly love. But assuming the identity of the old and the new, the commandment has been interpreted in three different ways. (1) With reference to i. 5 ff., to give proof of “walking in light” by the confession of sin and the avoiding of everything sinful. (2) With reference to the verses immediately preceding, to “walk as He walked.” Of these the second is the most natural, but it is not necessary to find a reference to any actual words of the Epistle which have preceded. The expressions which follow, “of which ye were in possession from the beginning," "the word which ye heard," make such a reference improbable. (3) The expression ἐντολὴ καὶνὴ recalls so vividly the language of the Gospel, and the connection with the duty of brotherly love insisted upon in vv. 9 and 10 is so clear, that we are almost compelled to interpret the passage in accordance with Jn. xiii. 34, ἐντολὴν καινὴν δίδωμι ὑμῖν ἵνα ἀγαπᾶτε ἀλλήλους, καθὼς ἠγάπησα ὑμᾶς, where the "newness" is to be found in the new standard required, καθὼς ἠγάπησα ὑμᾶς, rather than in the duty of mutual love, which was recognized in the Jewish law. In meaning this interpretation is practically identical with (2). "The idea of the imitation of Christ is identical with the fulfilment of love" (Westcott). And it gives the most natural meaning to the description of the commandment as old, and yet new "in Him and in you." The old commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour," which was already contained in the Mosaic law, if not also to be found in the conscience of those who "having no law, are a law unto themselves," received a new meaning and application in the light of Christ's teaching and example, and in the lives of His followers. And it had lately acquired a deeper meaning in contrast with the loveless intellectualism, which the writer clearly regarded as one of the worst dangers in the teaching and example of his opponents.

ἀγαπητοί] The first occurrence of the writer's favourite form of address in these Epistles. Cf. iii. 2, 21, iv. 1, 7; 3 Jn. 1, 2, 5, 11. No conclusion can be drawn from its use as to the meaning of the command. The reading of the received text (ἀδελφοί) is found in the vocative only once in these Epistles. Both words are suitable expressions to introduce an appeal to the readers to show their brotherhood in Christ by active brotherly love, whether the writer has primarily in view, as the objects of the love which he inculcates, Christians as Christians, or men as men. The attestation, however, is decisive in favour of ἀγαπητοί. And, on the whole, it is not only more in accordance with his style, but suits his appeal better. The ἀδελφοί may have been suggested by the language of vv. 9, 10.

ἀπ' ἀρχῆς] The meaning of this expression must, of course, be determined from the context in each case. It is used eight times in the First Epistle, and twice in the Second. In i. 1 it recalls the use of ἐν ἀρχῇ in the first chapter of Genesis and in the Prologue of the Gospel. Its use in iii. 8 (ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ὁ διάβολος ἀμαρτάει) is similar. Twice in this present chapter (ii. 13, 14) it occurs in the phrase, "Ye have known Him who is from the beginning." The remaining instances in the two Epistles all have reference to the "old" command. The repetition of the words at the end of ver. 7 (ὅν ἠκούσατε [ἀπ' ἀρχῆς]) in the
II. 7, 8.] NOTES ON I JOHN 35

Received Text is almost certainly wrong. They have probably been introduced from the similar phrase in ver. 24.

Where the phrase is used of the "old" command, it may refer either to the early days of the Mosaic legislation, or to the beginning of the education of each convert to whom the writer is speaking, or to the beginning of his life as a Christian. A reference to the teaching of Judaism on the subject of "love" seems, on the whole, to satisfy the conditions best in each case. But it is probably a mistake to attempt to define the meaning of the phrase very rigidly. Long continuance is suggested rather than a definite starting-point. It is not easy to determine whether the writer is thinking of the beginning of the life of each of his readers, or of their religious consciousness, or of their Christian life. The point can be settled only by the more general consideration of the character of the false teaching combated in these Epistles. The real force of the expression is to heighten the contrast of the "newer" teaching which placed knowledge higher than love. The writer has in view the ""Many Antichrists, who answered prompt 'Am I not Jaspar as thyself art John?

Nay, young, whereas through age thou mayest forget?"

He is confident that as against the "glozing of some new shrewd tongue" that which was "from the beginning" will prove to be "of new significance and fresh result."

δ λόγος δ'ν ἡκουσατε] "The word which ye heard" must be that which was told them by their teachers, whether Jewish or Christian or both. The command to love one's neighbour was common to both. δ λόγος more naturally suggests a whole message rather than one definite command. But it may refer to the new commandment of Jn. xiii. 34, regarded as a rule of life rather than a single precept.

eισχυτε] εισχυε 27. 29. 34. 42. 57lect 58lect asc kscr: habemus sah: habebamus arm-ed.

η τε] pr. κατ Ιατ.

8. The command, which is as old as the Law of Moses, even if the writer did not regard it as implicitly contained in the story of Cain and Abel (cf. iii. 11, 12, ἵνα ἀγαπῶμεν ἀλλήλους οὐ καθὼς Καλὴ κ.π.λ.) becomes new "in Him (i.e. Christ) and in you." The ἐντολη, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour," received an altogether new meaning and scope in the light of Christ's teaching as to “Who my neighbour is,” of His own example shown most clearly in His treatment of Tax-gatherers and Aliens, and of the carrying out of His example by His followers in the admission of Gentiles to the full privileges of Christianity on equal terms with the Jews. In Christ and in Christians the old command had gained “new significance and fresh result.” The verse had, no doubt, a special significance in view of the recent victory gained over the false teaching, and its depreciation of the law of love, which characterized the conduct and the thought of its supporters. The author rightly saw in recent events how the Church had “rescued the law of love” from the darkness which threatened to overwhelm it. The true light was shining more brightly in consequence, and the darkness more quickly passing away. But though these recent events were the occasion, they do not exhaust the meaning of the words, which have a far wider reference. Wurm, who argues with great plausibility for the reference to the victory over the false teachers (see esp. p. 104), apparently confines the reference to that incident too narrowly. Though it affords a fairly adequate explanation of the words ἐν ὑμῖν, it is unsatisfactory as an explanation of ἐν αὐτῷ. The new significance of the law of love in Christ and in Christians had a far wider application. The light of the true knowledge of God was already shining and dispelling the darkness of exclusiveness by the light of love wheresoever the “darkness overtook it not.”

πάλιν] The word clearly introduces another description of the same commandment, not another command. Cf. Jn. xvi. 28, πάλιν ἀφίημι τὸν κόσμον, where πάλιν cannot mean “a second time,” and 1 Co. xii. 21, οὐ δύναται ὁ ὀφθαλμός εἰπεῖν τῇ χειρί... ἡ πάλιν ἡ κεφαλὴ τοῖς ποσίν. Cf. also Jn. xix. 37; Ro. xv. 10, 11, 12; 1 Co. iii. 20; (?) 2 Co. x. 7, xi. 16; He. i. 5, (?) 6, ii. 13, iv. 5, x. 30. The use of πάλιν in the N.T. to introduce another quotation in proof of the same point, or a further thought about the same subject, is fully established.

8] The antecedent to the neuter relative is the clause ἐντολὴν καινὴν γράφω ὑμῖν. “It is a new commandment that I write unto you.” The order lays the emphasis on ἐντολὴν καινὴν. It is the “newness” of the old command which is said to be true in Him and in His followers.

ὅτι... φαίνει] The shining of the true light reveals the true character of that which the darkness hid or obscured. The force of the present tense in παράγεται and φαίνει is significant. They must be interpreted as presents. All is not yet clear and known, but the process has already begun. The darkness is passing away. Contrast “It has become bright as the sun upon earth, and the darkness is past” (Book of Enoch lviii 5).
There are many indications in the Epistle that the writer regards the Parousia as imminent. Cf. especially ver. 18, ἐσχάτη ῥώρα ἐστίν. The present verse throws some light on the difficult question of the relation between the teaching of the Gospel and that of the Epistle on the subject of the Parousia. In the Epistle the expectation is more clearly stated and more obviously felt than in the Gospel, though in the earlier work the idea of "the last day" not only receives definite expression, but is something more than an obsolete conception, alien to the author's real thoughts and sympathy, or a mere condescension to popular Christianity, fed on Apocalyptic expectation and unable to bear a purely spiritual interpretation. A difference of emphasis is not necessarily a change of view. It is doubtful if the two conceptions are really inconsistent. Their inconsistency would not be felt by a writer of the particular type of thought which characterizes the author. Their meeting point lies in the idea of "manifestation," which is his characteristic expression for the Parousia, as also for the earthly life of the Lord. For him the "Presence" is no sudden unveiling of a man from heaven, who in the twinkling of an eye shall destroy the old and set up the new. It is the consummation of a process which is continuously going on. It is the final manifestation of the things that are, and therefore the passing away of all that is phenomenal. As eternal life "is" now and "shall be" hereafter, as judgment is a process already going on, because men must show their true nature by their attitude to the Christ, while its completion is a final act; so the Parousia is the complete manifestation of that which is already at work. The time of its completion is still thought of as "the last day," and "the day of judgment." The true light is already shining, and the darkness is passing away. But He who is coming will come.
presented in sentences similar to vv. 4 and 6. The writer puts before his readers the cases of typical individuals, he that saith, he that loveth, he that hateth. The falsity of the claim is sharply stated. At the same time the form of expression (ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ ἐστὶν ἕως ἄρτι) would seem to suggest that there is more excuse for self-deception. The claimant is not called ψεύστης (v. 4). "It is always easy to mistake an intellectual knowledge for a spiritual knowledge of the Truth" (Westcott). To claim to have knowledge of God, actually realized in personal experience (γινώσκειν), without obeying his commands, is deliberate falsehood. To claim spiritual illumination without love may be due to the fact that we are deceiving ourselves. It may be the result of mistaken notions as to the function of the intellect. Those who put forward such a claim only show that their apprehension of the "light" is not at present so complete as they imagine.

The "light" is, of course, that which illumines the moral and spiritual spheres. Cf. Origen, Comm. in Joann. xiii. 23; φῶς οὖν ὄνομάζεται ὁ θεὸς ἀπὸ τοῦ σωματικοῦ φωτὸς μεταληφθεὶς εἰς ἀόρατον καὶ ἀσώματον φῶς, διὰ τὴν ἐν τῷ φωτίζειν νοητοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς δύναμιν ὁūτο λεγόμενος. In virtue of such "light" it is possible for men to go forward in moral duty and spiritual growth, just as the light of the sun makes it possible for them to walk on the earth's surface without stumbling or tripping up (cf. Jn. xi. 9 f.). μισῶν] The writer naturally does not deal with the possibility of intermediate states between love and hatred. In so far as the attitude of any particular man towards his fellow-man is not love, it is hatred. In so far as it is not hatred, it is love. The statements are absolute. The writer is not now concerned with their applicability to the complex feelings of one man towards another in actual life, or how the feelings of love and hatred are mingled in them. It is his custom to make absolute statements, without any attempt to work out their bearing on actual individual cases. His work is that of the prophet, not of the casuist.

tὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ] The full meaning of these verses can be realized only in the light of the revelation of the brotherhood of all men in Christ. In spite of the statements which are usually made to the contrary, we are hardly justified in saying that this universalism is beyond the writer's vision. The Christ of the Fourth Gospel is the Light of the World, but the command to love one another is given to those who have recognized His claims. In the Epistle, Christ is the Propitiation for the whole world. But this is potential rather than actual. The writer has to deal with present circumstances, and polemical aims undoubtedly colour the expression of his views. Prophet and not casuist as he is, he is nevertheless too much in earnest to lose sight of the practical. Vague generalities are not the instruments with which he works. A vapid philanthropy, or a pretentious cosmopolitanism, which might neglect the more obvious duties of love lying closer to hand, would find no favour with him. The wider brotherhood might be a hope for the future, as it is for us. But the idea of brotherhood was actually realized among Christians, though in his own community it is clear that much was still wanting in this respect. It is of this brotherhood that he is primarily thinking. In his letters to individuals this is even clearer than here (cf. 3 Jn. 5, 10). And the usage of the word ἀδελφοί in the New Testament certainly favours this view. At the same time, the wider view of the Sermon on the Mount and the Parable of the Good Samaritan is in no way contradicted by the more limited statements of this Epistle. The language used here lends itself easily to a similar expansion. The Lord had summarized the teaching of the Mosaic Law in the words, “Thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thine enemy.” The new light had revealed the brotherhood of all men. In its light the term “brother” includes both classes, neighbours and enemies, whom the Law had separated. He who now hates his “brother” has not had his mental vision cleared by the light. The writer’s words can easily be made to convey the wider truth. He certainly would not contradict it. What he enforces is the first step towards its realization. And he is always thinking of the next step which his readers must take. Note the emphatic position of ἕως ἄρτι: the light is shining and he is in darkness still.
II. 9, 10.] NOTES ON 1 JOHN 39

Om. totum comma saha.

10. The contrast is, as usual, stated in terms which carry it a stage further, μένεων being substituted for εἶναι. It is possible that a man might attain to the light. He cannot abide in it without showing that love which the new light has revealed to be the true attitude of Christian to Christian, and of man to man. Cf. Jn. xii. 46, ἅνα πᾶς ὁ πιστεύων εἰς ἐμὲ ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ μὴ μείνῃ: vili. 35, ὃ υἱὸς μένει εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα. The slave may learn much, but he cannot abide in the house for ever.

σκάνδαλον . . . ἔστιν] The stumbling-block may be that which a man puts either in his own way, or in that of his neighbour. The word is not found elsewhere in the Johannine books, except Apoc. ii. 14 (βαλεῖν σκάνδαλον ἐνώπιον τῶν υἱῶν Ἰσραήλ). The verb is found in Jn. vi. 61, xvi. 1. The general usage of the New Testament, and perhaps the use of the verb in the Fourth Gospel, is in favour of the second interpretation. And it gives a possible sense. He who loves his neighbour not only abides in the light himself, but is also free from the guilt of causing others to offend. But the general context almost requires the other explanation. The effect of love and hate on the man himself is the subject of the whole passage. The sphere of his moral and spiritual progress or decline is regarded as being within himself. The occasions of falling are within. Cf. Hos. iv 17, ἐθηκεν ἑαυτῷ σκάνδαλα. This may be suggested by what is probably the true form of the text, σκάνδαλον ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἐστιν, internal stumbling-block, causing offence within, there is none. Possibly ἐν αὐτῷ may refer to ἐν τῷ φωτί, “In the light there is nothing to cause stumbling.” Cf., however, Jn. xi. 9, 10. For the phrase itself we may compare the Rabbinic ὢν ἐν τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ said quoted by Schlatter from Sifre, Num. v. 15.

...
validity of their Christian position, so he hastens to assure them of it, and to use his assurance as the ground of the appeal which he is making. He writes to them the Epistle which is in course of composition (γράφω), because they are already members of the community of light. In virtue of what Christ is and has done, the sin which separates them from God has been, actually in part, potentially altogether, removed. The old, in their experience, and the young, in their strength, have a power which stands them in good stead. They can enjoy fellowship with God who is light, and in the communion of that fellowship they can see clearly so as to "walk" without stumbling, to avoid the false allurements of the world, and the consequences which would follow their acceptance of the false teaching of the many antichrists whose presence shows that the last hour is come. And the reasons which led him to write that part of his letter which has already been penned (ἔγραψα; cf. 27, where the ταῦτα shows that the reference is to the preceding verses) are similar. Those who have learned by experience the truth of the Fatherhood of God can confess the sins which their Father is faithful and just to forgive, and as παιδία who need and can obtain fatherly discipline and guidance they can go forward in the strength of love. Thus their position as Christians is the ground of his appeal. Much can be said to them which it would be impossible to address to those outside. Most, in fact, of what he has to say is of the nature of calling to remembrance that which they already know. The true safeguard against their present dangers lies in their realizing their Christian position, in carrying out in life the faith and knowledge which they already possess, in rekindling the enthusiasm of earlier days which has now grown cold. The experience of age, and the vigour of youth and early manhood, supply all that is needed to restore health in Christian thought and life. The life of the society is safe if the two classes of which it is composed will contribute of their treasure to the common store, and use for themselves and for the community the powers of which they are in actual possession.

γράφω] The present naturally refers to that which is in the course of composition, the letter as a whole. The present tense is used in i. 4, ii. 1, 13 (bis). In each case the reference may be to the whole Epistle, though where ταῦτα is used it has suggested to some the probability of a more limited reference. The simplest explanation of the use of the aorist in ver. 14 (ἔγραψα) is that the writer turns back in thought to that part of the letter which he has already finished, the writing of which can now be regarded as a simple complete act. Of the many explanations which have been offered this would seem on the whole to be the most natural, and least unsatisfactory. The suggestion that the author wished to vary the monotony of six repetitions of the same word need hardly be taken seriously. He is afraid neither of monotony nor of repetition, and the slight changes which he introduces into his repetitions are seldom, if ever, devoid of significance. A reference to a former document, either the Gospel, or a lost Epistle, is not probable. The reasons given for having written do not suit the Gospel, while they fit it admirably with the present Epistle, and with that part of it which has already taken shape. The Gospel was undoubtedly written for Christians rather than for those who were still "of the world." But its object was to instruct, to increase faith and deepen spiritual life, by imparting wider knowledge and clearer understanding of the real meaning of things already known. The aim of the Epistle is to emphasize the important points of what the readers have already grasped, and to persuade them to use their knowledge to meet present dangers. It was because of the knowledge which all possessed, of the Christian experience of the elder, and the strength and achievements in the Christian warfare of the younger among his readers, that he could make his appeal. But for that, he could not have written what he had written. A reference to a former Epistle must almost necessarily have been made clearer and more definite. It is, of course, quite possible that he had written to them before the present occasion. That the Canon has preserved but a selection of the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic correspondence is proved by the references contained in the Pauline Epistles, and probably in 3 Jn. 9. And if such a letter had been written, it might have been misunderstood and have required further explanation or justification (cf. Karl, p. 32), as S. Paul found on two occasions during his correspondence with the Corinthians. But there is nothing in the passage to suggest that this was the case.

It is still more difficult to suppose that the presents and the aorists have exactly the same reference. The use of the "epistolary aorist" by which the author mentally transfers himself to the position of the recipients of the letter, or "regards his letter as ideally complete," is established. But it does not give us a satisfactory explanation of the change from present to aorist. Law's suggestion (The Tests of Life, p. 309), that after writing as far as the end of ver. 13 "the author was interrupted in his composition, and that, resuming his pen, he naturally caught up his line of thought by repeating his last sentence," is ingenious. But again it must be noticed that there is nothing to indicate that such a break actually took place. Repetition with slight changes not insignificant is a regular feature of the author's style.

On the whole, the explanation to which preference has been given above is the best solution of a difficult problem, unless we prefer to leave it in the class of problems insoluble without the fuller knowledge of the exact circumstances, which doubtless made the writer's meaning, and reasons for writing as he did, quite clear to those who read his words.

\textit{тёквіа} The use of the diminutive is confined in the New Testament to the Johannine writings, with the exception of one passage in S. Paul (Gal. iv. 19) where the reading is doubtful.
It occurs only once in the Gospel. Its use is comparatively frequent in the Epistle (ii. 1. 12, 28, iii. 7, 18, iv. 4, v. 21). It is a natural word for the aged disciple, or Apostle, to use when addressing the members of a Church of whom many were no doubt his "sons in the Faith," and practically all must have belonged to a younger generation than himself. Differences of meaning must not always be pressed, but the word expresses community of nature, as contrasted with \(\pi\alpha\iota\delta\iota\alpha\), which suggests the need of moral training and guidance (cf. i Co. xiv. 20, \(\mu\gamma\) \(\pi\alpha\iota\delta\iota\alpha\ \gamma\iota\nu\varepsilon\sigma\theta\e\ \tau\ai\s\ \phi\rho\e\rho\iota\iota\nu\)). Throughout the Epistle the word seems to be used as a term of affection for the whole society to which the author writes. The final warning of the Epistle (v. 21) against idols, literal or metaphorical, could hardly be addressed to the children as opposed to the grown-up members of the community.

The regular usage of the word in the Epistle has an important bearing on the next difficulty which these verses present, the question whether a double or triple division of the readers is intended. In the former case the clauses containing the vocatives \textit{тёквіа} and \(\pi\alpha\iota\delta\iota\alpha\) are addressed to the whole community, which is then divided into the two classes of \(\pi\alpha\te\re\pe\s\) and \(\varepsilon\nu\varepsilon\iota\\nu\iota\iota\kappa\o\). This is now generally recognized as the most satisfactory interpretation. A triple division in which fathers are the middle term, could only be accepted as a last necessity.
It might be possible, as Karl maintains, that the writer should first state the two extremes and then add the mean. But it is in the last degree improbable. Augustine's explanation, "Filioli, qua baptismo neonati sunt, patres, quia Christum patrem et antiquum dierum agnoscent, adolescentes, quia fortes sunt et ualidi," fails to justify the relative position of the last two terms.
And both terms, \textit{тёквіа} and \(\pi\alpha\iota\delta\iota\alpha\), have their significance as addressed to the whole body. All the children of the Kingdom share in the forgiveness of sins which Christ has won for them, and all are \(\pi\alpha\iota\delta\iota\alpha\); for the teaching and exhortation, which he has found it necessary to impart to them, show that none of them has finished his Christian education. Not even the eldest of them is as yet \(\tau\e\l\e\i\i\o\s\).
ὅτι. Does it introduce the contents of what is written, or the reasons for writing? Usage is probably in favour of the "causal" meaning. There is no certain instance in the Epistle of the use of ὅτι after γράφω in the "declarative" sense (cf. ver. 21). The "contents" are generally expressed by an objective accusation (ταῦτα, ἐντολὴν καινὴν). But this is not decisive. It is a question which must be decided by the general meaning of the individual passage. In these verses the causal meaning certainly gives the better sense. Rothe, indeed, makes out a case for the declarative. "Here again (as in i. 5) John gives expression in another pregnant formula to that which he has to say to them. Shortly summarized it is this. He would have them know that in their case none of the necessary conditions for a complete Christianity are wanting, in all its real earnestness and joyful confidence. He adds further that this is not the first time that he has written this to them" (Der erste Brief Johannis, p. 61 f.). In other words, he has nothing new to tell them as Christians. He is merely reminding them of what they are. But surely the writer is doing more than this. He does not merely remind them of their Christian standing. He is trying to show them how their position as Christians enables them to meet the dangers to which they are exposed, and so to justify and enforce the appeal which he is making. It is because they are in fellowship with God and have real experience of the Fatherhood of God that he can appeal to them with confidence that his appeal will meet with a response.

ἀφέωνται] Cf. Lk. v. 20, 23, vii. 47, 48, and (probably) Jn. xx. 23. The present is used in Matthew and Mark.

διὰ τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ] The "name" always stands for that which is implied by the name. In Jewish thought the name is never merely appellative. Because Christ is what He is, and has done what He has done, true relations between God and man have again become possible. If any definite name is intended, it is probably the name "Jesus Christ" (cf. ii. 1). The expression is not the mere equivalent of "because of His position as Paraclete and Propitiation." See Briggs, The Messiah of the Apostles, p. 475.

The origin of the phrase is probably to be found in the Old Testament doctrine that God continued His kindness to Israel, in spite of their rebelliousness, for His name's sake. Cf. especially Ezk. xx. 8, 9, "They rebelled—but I wrought for My name's sake"; xxxvi. 22, "I do not this for your sakes, O house of Israel, but for Mine holy name." It has, however, acquired a somewhat different meaning as used by the author. We may also compare the Rabbinic parallel, quoted by Schlatter, "The wise say, For His name's sake He dealt with them (ὁμο\textsuperscript{2}ις ὑπὸ ὑποστήριξις, Mechilta, Ex. xiv. 15, 296).

τεκνια[τεκνια] τεκνια 1. 10. 40: παιδια 27. 29. 66\textsuperscript{}. 68. 103. 106 sah. cat. Sev.

υμιν[υμιν] υμων L 31. 68. 99 a\textsuperscript{scr} j\textsuperscript{scr} k\textsuperscript{scr} sah\textsuperscript{d}.

13. πατέρες] The word is more naturally taken as referring to actual age than to length of Christian experience. “The knowledge which comes of long experience is the characteristic endowment of mature years.” But the τὸν ἀπ᾿ ἀρχῆς shows that the writer is thinking of length of years as giving the opportunity of maturity of Christian experience. And he writes in full view of the circumstances. The full significance of the Person of Jesus Christ was apprehended only very gradually either in the society of His followers, or by its individual members. And in the knowledge which had been thus slowly gained was to be found the corrective of the false views which were leading men astray (ver. 27). The knowledge of the fathers, as well as the strength of the young men, was needed to meet the difficulties of the time.

τὸν ἀπ᾿ ἀρχῆς] The Word who was in the beginning with God, of whose manifestation in human life the writer and his contemporaries had been witnesses, and in whom the “fathers” had come to believe with growing knowledge and fuller conviction as they gained experience, though they had not seen Him. The phrase, “Him who is from the beginning,” would have no special significance here as applied to God. On the other hand, the refusal, on the part of many among whom the writer lived, to believe that the pre-existent Logos had become truly incarnate in Jesus of Nazareth, and to go forward in that belief to closer fellowship, seemed to him to be the most serious intellectual danger which threatened the Church of his day.

νενικήκατε τὸν πονηρόν] “The characteristic of youth is victory, the prize of strength.” The conquest of evil, here represented as the result of an active struggle with a personal foe (τὸν πονηρόν), is as characteristic of the earlier years of Christian endeavour as is the fuller knowledge gained through experience of its later years. The words have probably a primary reference to the victory which had been gained in the assertion of the truth, and which led to the withdrawal of the false teachers. But they were meant to go beyond their original reference. If it was “better age, exempt from strife should know,” it was also “better youth should strive toward making.” And in both cases the appeal is made on the ground of what has already been gained. To the younger generation belonged the strength, already trained and tested, which the experience of the elders could guide. And both could rely on what had been acquired through past successes in the special efforts which the present and the future demanded from the whole Society.

eυκωκατε] ευκωκαυμεν 76 161 (498).
tον πονηρον] το πονηρον Ν 95.

14. For the moment the writer's thoughts turn back to what he has already written. In what he has already said he has treated them as παιδία, still in need of discipline and guidance. Their faith had not yet grown to maturity. And this was true of all alike, young and old, the thinkers as well as the soldiers of the Society. But it was in virtue of their Christian standing that he could speak to them as he did. In the Jewish Synagogue or in the Christian Church they had all learned to know God as their Father. The elders among them had made real progress in their realization of what the Christ really is. The younger and more active converts had gained the strength which comes of victory over evil. Perhaps they had rendered conspicuous service in the recent crisis. And their powers had matured in the strife. The message of the Gospel was a living force within them, and permanently active. It was abiding in them. There were flaws in the work which needed mending. It had been necessary to treat them, young and old alike, as not yet “grown up.” The false pleas which many among them were only too ready to listen to, if not to urge, must be sharply and clearly exposed. Statements which they might well make, perhaps in some cases had made, must be called quite definitely “lies.” He must not shrink from plain language. But he could never have ventured to use the language which he had not hesitated to address to them, had it not been for the great progress which they had already made in the things of Christ. Strength and experience were really theirs. Reproofs could be uttered and appeals made with full confidence of success. Their Christian faith was sound, even though their hands might be slack, and their minds somewhat listless. For them victory and knowledge were abiding results, and not mere incidents in past history.

εγραψα] Cf. the notes on ver. 12. The γράφω of the Received Text is probably due to an attempt to get a series of three in the right order of age, by correctors who failed to grasp the general arrangement of these verses.

eγραψα 2°] scribo, vg-ed.
eγραψα 3°] scribo, vg-ed.
tον απ αρχης] το απ αρχης Β. tον θεου] om. Β sah.
II. 15, 16. NOTES ON I JOHN: 47

15-17. Warning against love of the world.

The writer appeals to his readers, on the ground of their Christian standing, to avoid the love of the world. For him the world is the whole created system, considered as apart from God and opposed to God. But there is a tendency to narrow down its meaning either to humanity as estranged from God or regardless of God, or to all that is opposed to the Christian view. Such love for the present and finite, either as a whole or in its several parts, excludes the possibility of the higher love, of God and of men as brethren in Christ, which is the essential characteristic of "walking in light," and the observance of which sums up the whole of Christian duty in one command, at once old and new. The evil desires which assail men through the lower part of their nature in general, or through the sense of vision in particular, or through the external good which falls to their lot, if regarded and used as opportunities for display, have their origin not in the Father, but in the world which has broken loose from Him. And the world and the desires which it fosters are alike transitory. Only that which falls in with God's will, and carries forward His purpose, is of permanent value and lasting character.

15. ὁ κόσμος is not merely "an ethical conception" in the Johannine system, "mankind fallen away from God." Such an interpretation leaves no intelligible sense to the phrase τὰ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ. It is the whole system, considered in itself, apart from its Maker, though in many cases the context shows that its meaning is narrowed down to "humanity." In the view of the writer, no doubt man is its most important part, the centre of the whole. But here it is used in its wider sense. The various interpretations which have been given of the phrase can be found in Huther and elsewhere. The majority of them are in reality paraphrases of particular instances of its use. As contrasted with ὁ κόσμος, τὰ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ are the individual objects which excite admiration or love. In the next verse they are spoken of collectively. Comp. Ja. i. 27, iv. 4.

16. The attempt to find in the terms of this verse a complete catalogue of sins, or even of "worldly" sins, is unsatisfactory. The three illustrations of "all that is in the world" are not meant to be exhaustive. The parallelism to the mediæval vōluptas, auaritia, superbia is by no means exact. We may compare the sentence quoted by Wettstein from Stobæus, φιλη-δονία μὲν ἐν ταῖς ἀπολαύσεις, ταῖς διὰ σώματος, πλεονεξία δὲ ἐν τῷ κερδαίνειν, φιλοδοξία δὲ ἐν τῷ καθυπερέχειν τῶν ἴσων τε καὶ ὁμοίων: but it is an illustration of the natural tendency to threefold division rather than an exact parallel. Still less successful is the attempt to find instances of the three classes in the Temptation of our Lord. The “desire of the simplest support of natural life” is hardly an ἐπιθυμία τῆς σαρκός. The first temptation turned on the wish, or the suggestion, to use supernatural powers to gratify a natural want. The “offer of the kingdoms of the civilized world” is not very closely connected with the “lust of the eyes.” Nor again is the “call to claim an open manifestation of God’s protecting power” an obvious instance of the use of gifts for personal ostentation. All such endeavours to find an ideal completeness in the ad hoc statements of a letter, written to particular people to meet their special needs, are misleading.

The opposition in this verse is not strictly accurate. “The things that are in the world” suggest objects, whether material or not, which call out desires or boasting rather than the feelings of desire or pride themselves. But it is quite in keeping with the author’s style.

τῆς σαρκός] σάρξ denotes human nature as corrupted by sin. Cf. Gal. v 17 (ἡ γὰρ σὰρξ ἐπιθυμεῖ κατὰ τοῦ πνεύματος, τὸ δὲ πνεῦμα κατὰ τῆς σαρκός). The genitive is subjective, the desire which the flesh feels, in that which appeals to the man as gratifying the flesh. There is no need to narrow down the meaning any further to special forms of desire. There is really nothing in the Epistle to suggest that the grosser forms of immorality were either practised or condoned by the false teachers.

ἡ ἐπιθυμία τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν] The desire for all that appeals to the man as gratifying his sense of vision, a special form of the more general desire already described. Comp. πνεῦμα ὁράσεως, μεθ’ ὡς γίνεται ἐπιθυμία (Testament of Reuben ii. 4).

The substantive is found in Ro. i. 30; 2 Ti. iii. 2. Love of display by means of external possessions would seem to be what is chiefly intended here. Βίος is always life in its external aspect, or the means of supporting life. Cf. iii. 17, ὃς ἄν πάντα ἐξ ἐχθροῦ τοῦ βίου τοῦ κόσμου: Lk. viii. 14, xv. 12.

ἐκ τοῦ πατρός] All such desires and feelings are not part of that endowment of humanity which has come from the Father. They are a perversion of man’s true nature as God made him.
They have their origin in the finite order in so far as it has become estranged from God.

17. All such objects of desire must in the end prove unsatisfactory, because of their transitory character. Permanent value attaches only to such things as correspond to God’s plan for the world and for men. He that fulfils God’s destiny for himself “abideth for ever.” “In the mind of God, values are facts, and indestructible facts. Whatever has value in God’s sight is safe for evermore; time and change cannot touch it.”

“All that is, at all,
Lasts ever, past recall;
Earth changes, but thy soul and God stand sure;
What entered into thee
That was, is, and shall be,”

II. ii. 18–27. Belief in Jesus as the Christ the sign of fellowship with God. (Christological Thesis.) The truth in contrast with the second “lie.”

(1) Appearance of Antichrists the sign of the end (18).
(2) Their relation to the Church (19–21).
(3) Content and meaning of their false teachings (22–25).
(4) Repeated assurance that the Readers are in possession of the Truth (26, 27).

18–21. The writer passes by a natural transition from the thought of the transitoriness of the world to that of its approaching end. The many forms of false teaching which have appeared are embodiments of the spirit of Antichrist, and therefore are sure signs of the nearness of the end. The coming of Antichrist had formed part of the Apostolic teaching which had been imparted to them all. His “coming” was a recognized sign of the imminence of the Parousia.

It is a matter of dispute whether the false teachers, or the spirits of error who inspire them, are to be regarded as so many precursors and heralds of Antichrist himself, in whom all the various forces of hostility to Messiah are to be gathered up for the one final conflict, or whether the many false teachers are to be thought of as actual manifestations of Antichrist, convincing proofs that the spirit of Antichrist is already present in the world. The form of the sentence, καθὼς ἠκούσατε . . . καὶ ἐνίκησεν ὑμᾶς ἀνατέλων, is in favour of the latter explanation. "You have always been taught that Antichrist is to come. The prophecy is now being fulfilled in the many Antichrists who have made their appearance." Such an interpretation would be natural among the Disciples of the Lord. Had He not taught His Apostles to see the fulfilment of what Malachi, and others, prophesied about the Return of Elijah before the great and terrible Day of the Lord in the coming of John Baptist? And it is in complete harmony with the author's way of thinking. In the Johannine teaching the present working of forces is not always clearly distinguished or sharply separated from their final manifestation. The author can speak of "having passed from death unto life," and still look forward to a "raising up at the last day" without betraying any consciousness of the supposed inconsistency, which a certain type of criticism has found in his method of presentation. He would probably have regarded with complete indifference the question of whether the many antichristian forces, of whose present working he was assured, were to find their consummation in the person of a single opponent before the final manifestation of his Lord and his God, or not. There is no reason to suppose that he could not have found room for such a figure in his scheme of expectation. His immediate concern is with the relation of the many false teachers, who now show forth the spirit of Antichrist, to the Christian community. They had separated themselves off from the society of Christians, and their action was to the writer clear proof that their connection with that body could never have been more than superficial. Those who had "gone out" could never have been really "of" the community which they had not hesitated to leave, or in true union and fellowship with the Christ. It was necessary for the health of the body that all such should be clearly seen to be no true members of it. Their true character needed to be disclosed. And the readers could discover the truth for themselves if they were willing to use and trust the powers of discernment which they possessed. In their baptism they had received the anointing of the Holy One, even as the Kings and Priests of the old Covenant were anointed with the oil which symbolized the gift of God's Spirit. What had then been granted to a few was now extended to all. They all possessed the gift of knowledge which enabled them to grasp the truth of what Christ had revealed. In what he wrote to them the author was not teaching new truths. He was recalling to their mind what they already knew. And knowing the truth, they knew that no falsehood could have anything to do with it.

(1) 18. The appearance of Antichrists the sign of the end.

παιδία] He still addresses them by the title which emphasizes their need of instruction and guidance. Cf. ver. 14, and perhaps iii. 7.

ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα] The absence of the article emphasizes the character of the period. It suggests no idea of a series of periods of stress which are to precede the several comings of Christ. The conception of many partial "comings" has a very important place in the elucidation of the permanent value of the New Testament expectations of the Coming of the Christ, but it is not to be found in those expectations themselves. The Johannine teaching, whatever its origin may be, has taught us to spiritualize the New Testament expression of the doctrine of the last things. But the writer held firmly to the expectation of a final manifestation of the Christ at "the last day," and he seems to have expected it within the remaining years of his own lifetime. When he uses the phrase "last hour" he clearly means the short period, as he conceived it to be, which still remained before the final manifestation of the last day. The phrase is found here only in the New Testament. The expression ἡ ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα occurs in the Gospel (seven times), and never without the article. Its use is confined to the Gospel. Cf. Ac. ii. 17 (αἱ ἐσχ. ημ.). 2 Ti. iii. 1 (ἐσχ. ἡμέραι); 1 P. i. 5 (ἐν καιρῷ ἐσχάτῳ); Jude 18 (ἐν ἐσχάτῳ χρόνῳ). The use of ὥρα in connection with the coming of Christ is frequent in the Gospels, Mt. xxiv. 36 (=Mk. xiii. 32), xxiv. 42, 44, 50, 49, 40, 40, Cf. Ro. xiii. 11; Apos. iii. 3.

The "last hour" is the last period of the interval between the first and second coming of the Christ. Christian expectation had inherited from Jewish apocalyptic the doctrine of a period of extreme distress which was immediately to precede the coming of Messiah, and in which the hostility of the World Powers was to culminate in a single opponent. In the prevalence of so many false views about the Person of Jesus, and His relation to God, the writer sees the surest signs of their approach, and probably the true fulfilment of the prediction of His coming.

καθὼς ἠκούσατε] Cf. Mt. xxiv. 15, 24; Mk. xiii. 6; Ac. xx. 30, and especially 2 Th. ii. 3. The subject formed part of the general apostolic teaching. As in ver. 24, the aorist refers to the time when they were instructed in the faith.

ἀντίχριστος] The preposition can denote either one who takes the place of another (cf. ἀνθύπατος), or one who opposes (cf. ἀντιστράτηγος), used of the opposing general, Thucyd. vii. 86, as well as in later times for the Propraetor). The word may therefore mean one who, pretending to be the Christ, really opposes Him and seeks to destroy His work. The word is found in the N.T. only here and in ii. 22, iv. 3; 2 Jn. 7. But though the word appears first in these Epistles, the idea is undoubtedly taken over from Jewish Apocalyptic thought, to which it is also probable that early Babylonian, or at least Semitic, nature-myths had contributed. It is impossible to explain the references to the subject which are found in the New Testament (Synoptic Eschatological discourses, Pauline Epistles, especially 2 Th., and Apocalypse) from the New Testament itself and the apocalyptic portions of Daniel and Zechariah. There must have been some popular tradition, at once definite within certain limits and varying according to the circumstances of the times, from which the N.T. writers have drawn independently. The late Christian writers, who may have derived the name from the passages in these Epistles, have certainly drawn their material from other sources besides the books of the N.T. The Johannine Epistles contribute nothing but the first mention of the name. The author refers to a popular tradition only to spiritualize it. He makes no substantial addition to our knowledge of its content (see additional note).

ἔρχεται] sitventurus (vg.), cf. Mk. ix. 12, Ἡλείας μὲν ἔλθων . . . ἀποκαθιστάνει. The present expresses the fact as the subject of common teaching, rather than as about to be realized immediately. Cf. the use of ὁ ἐρχόμενος, Mt. xi. 3, xxi. 9; Mk. xi. 9; Lk. vii. 19, 20, xiii. 35; Jn. i. 15, 27, vi. 14, xii. 13; Ac. xix. 4; (?) 2 Co. xi. 4; He. x. 37.

γεγόνασιν] “have come to be,” “have arisen.” Their appearance was a natural outcome of the growth of Christianity. As the truth of what Christ really was came to be more and more clearly realized in the gradual growth of Christian life and experience, those who had been attracted to the movement by partial views and external considerations, which had nothing to do with its essential import, were necessarily driven into sharper antagonism. Growth necessitated the rejection of that which did not contribute to true life. In the extent of such developments the writer finds clear indication that the process is nearing completion (ὅθεν γινώσκομεν).

ὅθεν γινώσκομεν δη] It is the writer’s favourite method of exposition first to make his statement and then to state the facts by which his readers can assure themselves of its truth. When their first enthusiasm had died out, and delay had brought disappointment, the question was often being asked, “How can we know?” “From the fact just stated we come to know.”
II. 18, 19.] NOTES ON I JOHN

παιδια] αδελφοι Ia 175 (319).
ωρα 1ο] for τη C*.
και] om. k.
οτι Ν Β Κ Π al. pler. cat. vg. syr aeth. Or. Epiph. Ir. Cypr.] om. A L 17. 96. 100. 142 aeth.10, γινωσκομεν] γινωσκωμεν A.

(2) 19. εξηλθαν] Cf. 3 Jn. 7. The word indicates (1) that originally they were members of the community, “they drew their origin from us,” (2) that they had now separated themselves from the community. It suggests, if it does not compel us to assume, that their “going forth” was their own act, and not due to excommunication. But it is useless to attempt to reproduce by conjecture the exact historical circumstances, which were too well known to both writer and readers to need further elucidation. The false teachers had ceased to belong to the community to which they had formerly attached themselves—of the manner of their going forth, or of the exact causes which led to it, we are ignorant.

ἀλλα] In spite of their external membership, they had never been true members of the Body.
οὐκ ἦσαν ἐξ ἡμῶν] Their connection was purely external. They did not share the inner life.
εἰ γάρ] Cf. iv. 20, v. 3; 2 Jn. 11; 3 Jn. 3, 7. As a rule, the writer uses the more “objective” ὅτι to state the cause.
εξ ἡμῶν] The emphasis is now laid on the words εξ ἡμῶν. They were not ours; if ours they had been, they would have remained with those to whom they (inwardly) belonged.
μεμενήκεσαν ἄν] The word μένειν, though it is here the obvious word to use in any case, had a special significance for the writer. “The slave abideth not in the house for ever. The son abideth for ever.” The test of true discipleship was to “abide” in the truth, as made known by those who had seen the Lord and been taught by Him. The writer cannot conceive the possibility of those who had ever fully welcomed the truth breaking their connection with the Christian society. External membership was no proof of inward union. The severing of the connection showed that such membership had never been anything but external.
μεθ᾽ ἡμῶν] naturally expresses outward fellowship as distinguished from inward communion.

It was natural that the authors of theories of predestination should find in this verse confirmation of their doctrine.

The writer follows his usual practice, which was also the practice of his Master, of making absolute statements without qualification. But the whole teaching and aim of his Epistle shows that he recognized the danger, and therefore the possibility, of those who were truly "members of Christ" falling away. "The subject here is neither a donum perseverantiae, nor a distinction of the Vocati and Electi."

ἀλλ᾽ ἵνα For the elliptic use of ἵνα, cf. Jn. i. 8, xiii. 18; Apoc. xiv. 13. The result is contemplated as part of the Divine purpose. Some such phrase as ἀπὸ γέφυραν must be supplied, or the sense may be brought out by a paraphrase, "they had to be made manifest." ("Sie sollen offenbar werden," Weiss).

οὐκ εἶσιν πάντες ἐξ ἡμῶν It is tempting to take the negative as qualifying πάντες, in spite of the fact that the two words are separated by the verb. In this case the meaning would be that the incident, or incidents, to which the verse refers served a wider purpose than the mere unmasking of the individuals concerned. It showed that external membership is no proof of inward union. Their unmasking was necessary, for not all who were external members of the Church really and inwardly belonged to it. But the usage of the New Testament in general, and of the author in particular, is decisive against such an interpretation of οὐ... πᾶς when the negative is separated from the πᾶς. Cf. Mt. xxv. 22; Mk. xiii. 20; Lk. i. 37; Ac. x. 14, xi. 8; 1 Co. i. 29; Gal. ii. 16; Eph. iv. 29, v. 5; Jn. iii. 15, 16, vi. 39; 1 Jn. ii. 21; Apoc. vii. 1, 16, ix. 4, xviii. 22, xxi. 27, xxi. 3. There is no parallel instance of οὐ... πάντες where the words are separated. But the usage with the singular, and the influence of Hebrew and Aramaic forms of expression on the style of the writer, suggest that the plural should be understood as the singular undoubtedly must be interpreted. And the meaning thus obtained is supported by the context. The subject is, of course, the "Antichrists," who have severed their connection with the Christian Body. The interpretation given above suffers from the extreme awkwardness of having to break the sentence by taking ὅτι in a casual sense. "Their detection had to be brought about; for all members are not true members, and the fact must needs be made clear." It is still more awkward to suppose (as Weiss) that the sentence is continued, "as if ἵνα φανερωθῇ had preceded." It seems clear, therefore, that the negative must qualify the verb, according to the usual construction of οὐ... πᾶς, and οὐ... πᾶς. And the meaning must be, "they had to be made manifest; it was necessary to show that none of them, however specious their pretensions, however much they differed in character or in opinions, were truly members of the Body." The extent of the apostasy, and the variety of attack, had caused surprise and alarm. The writer assures his "children" that it had its place and purpose in the counsels of Him who saith, "A whole I planned." The author finds comfort and assurance, for himself and for his readers, in the thought that whatever happens is included in the one purpose of God, however much appearances may seem to indicate the contrary. He has his own language in which to express the Pauline ἀγαπῶσιν τὸν θεὸν πάντα συνεργεῖ εἰς ἀγαθόν.

20. If the readers had trusted their own knowledge and Christian experience it would have been unnecessary for the writer to point out the antichristian tendency of the false teachers who had "gone forth." The readers would have detected it themselves. What he writes is an appeal to their knowledge rather than an attempt to supply its deficiencies by instruction. In virtue of the gift of the Holy Spirit which all had received at baptism, they all had knowledge to deal with the circumstances of the case. See Findlay, p. 223.

χρίσμα] The idea is suggested by the preceding ἀντίχριστοι.
They had the true unction of which the opponents claimed to be in possession.

It is hardly correct to say that according to its form the word χρίσμα must denote, not the act of anointing, but the anointing oil (Salböl, Weiss). Words ending in -μα can certainly denote the action of the verb, regarded as a whole rather than in process, and in a sense corresponding to the use of the cognate accusative.
The use of the word in the O.T., where it occurs chiefly in Exodus, points in the same way. Τὸ ἔλαιον τοῦ χρίσματος is the usual translation of ἔλαιον ἱερατίας εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα; Τὸ ἔλαιον χρίσμα ἅγιον (A, χρίσεως B), Τὴν τό: of prophets, Those who were so consecrated were regarded as thereby endued with the Holy Spirit, and with divine gifts. Cf. 1 S. xvi. 13, ἔχρισεν αὐτὸν ἀπὸ τῆς ἡμέρας ἀπὸ τῆς ἡμέρας: Is. lxiii. 1, πνεῦμα κυρίου ἐπὶ Δαυεὶδ ἀπὸ τῆς ἡμέρας ἀπὸ τῆς ἡμέρας οὗ εἵνεκεν, τὸν ἐξήλατον. Under the new dispensation the special gift, which in old times was bestowed on the few, is the common possession of all. Cf. Joel ii. 28 (iii. 1); Ac. ii. And in virtue of the gift of the Holy Ghost all have knowledge. The true text emphasizes the universality of the possession among Christians (οἴδατε πάντες), and not of the knowledge which it conveys (πάντα). The possession by all of the knowledge which enables them to discern, and not the extent of their knowledge, is the ground of the writer's appeal. ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου] The evidence is not decisive as to whether the writer meant these words to refer to the Father or to the Son, or, indeed, whether he was conscious of the necessity of sharply defining the distinction. All things which men receive from the Father, they have from the Son, in virtue of their connection with Him. The definition of personality which later ages found to be necessary was apparently not present to the consciousness of the writer. Sometimes he distinguishes Father and Son with absolute clearness. At other times he uses language which may be applied indifferently to either. The relation of the Son to the Father is not conceived in accordance with ideas of personality which belong to later ages.

Ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ Ἰσραήλ is frequently found as a title of God in the O.T. Cf. Ps. lxx, 22, lxxvii. 41; Is. i. 4, v. 16, xvii. 7, 8, xxx. 12, 15, xxxvii. 23, xli. 20: ὁ ἅγιος Ἰσραήλ, xliii. 3, xlv. 11, xlix. 7, lv. 5. The absolute use of ὁ ἅγιος is rare, and confined to late books, Hab. iii. 3; Bar. iv. 22, v. 2 (A, τοῦ ἁγίου B); Tob. xii. 12, 15 (κυρίου Ν). The usage of the Apocalypse (iii. 7, ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ ἁγίου ὁ ἁληθινός) favours the reference to God. On the other hand, in Mk. i. 24, Jn. vi. 69, ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ ἁγίου ὁ ἁληθινός is used of Christ. And the teaching of the later discourses in S. John on the subject of the Mission of the Spirit by Christ, and in His name, makes the reference to Christ more probable. We may also compare Ac. iii. 14, τὸν ἅγιον καὶ δίκαιον. The evidence, therefore, though not conclusive, is on the whole in favour of referring the title to Christ, if a sharp distinction ought to be made.

By their chrism they were set apart for the service of the Holy One, and endued with the powers necessary for that service. It is immaterial whether the writer speaks of God or of Christ as the immediate source of their holiness.

καὶ οἴδατε πάντες] The reading of the Received Text is an obvious correction. It presents a smooth and easy text which is in reality far less suitable to the context than the reading of the older authorities. The emphasis is on “knowing.” This is brought out with greater force and clearness by the omission of the object. Under the new covenant, knowledge is the common possession of all. The chrism is no longer confined to kings and priests. The gift of the Spirit, of which it is the symbol and the “effective means,” is for all Christians alike. Incidentally also the difference between the old covenant and the new serves to emphasize the more pressing difference between the claims of a select few to have a monopoly of knowledge, and the Christian view that the gifts of the Spirit are for all. Cf. Lk. xi. 13, πόσῳ μᾶλλον ὁ πατὴρ ὁ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ δώσει πνεῦμα ἅγιον τοῖς αἰτοῦσιν αἰτῶν; και 1ο] sed vg.
II. 20, 21.
NOTES ON I JOHN

χρισμα] χαρισμα Ia 502 (116).
(?) om. oiđate, ~exeτε post και 2ο K 500.

21. The writer’s appeal to his readers to use their power of discernment is based on their knowledge, not on their need of instruction. But for such knowledge it would be useless to make the appeal.

ἐγραψα] refers, as usual, to what has been already written, and especially to what immediately precedes.

και ὅτι παν ψεῦδος κ.τ.λ.] This clause may be either subordinate to the preceding one, depending on the verb οἴδατε, or co-ordinate with it; (1) if ὅτι is demonstrative the meaning will be, “Because you know the truth, and know that no lie is of the truth, and therefore must reject the lie the moment its true character is made manifest”; (2) if the ὅτι is causal, the sentence must mean, “I have written what I have written because you have knowledge, and because no lie has its source in the truth. Those who know the truth are in a position to detect at once the true character of that which is opposed to it.” In the first case, they need teaching that the thing is a lie, and they will at once reject it. In the second, their knowledge of the truth enables them to detect at once the character of its opposite. The latter gives the fullest sense, and that which is most in harmony with the context. If he can but awaken their knowledge, his task is done. They possess the means, if they will only use them. The whole object of the Epistle is to “stir up the gift that is in them.”

παν . . . οὐκ ἐστιν] For the construction, see the notes on ver; 19. And for ἐκ, cf. vv. 16, 19 and Lk. xx. 5.

οτι 2ο] om. I β 368 (266).
kai] om. boh-ed.
παν] om. C.
(3) 22-25. Content and meaning of the false teaching, 22 ff.
Falsehood finds its consummation in the one lie, which denies that Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ, i.e. not merely the Jewish Messiah, but also the Christ according to the wider conception of His office which finds its expression in the Fourth Gospel and in this Epistle. Such a denial is the very work of Antichrist, who, setting himself up for Christ, destroys the work of the true Christ. The denial of the Son carries with it the denial of the Father also. The false teachers, whether Jews who claim to worship the same God as the Christians after a true fashion, or "Gnostics" who claim a superior and exclusive knowledge of the Father of all, forfeit their claim by rejecting the revelation of Himself which He has given in His Son Jesus Christ. The confession of the Son, in word and in life, affords the only true access to the Father.

22. τίς] Cf. v. 5, τίς ἐστιν ὁ νικῶν . . . εἶ μή; there is no other exact parallel in the N.T. The expression is forcible. No one else stands for falsehood so completely as he who denies that Jesus is the Christ.

ὁ ψεύτης] The article is not merely generic, denoting the individual who adequately represents the class. It denotes the liar, par excellence, in whom falsehood finds its most complete expression. Cf. Jn. iii. 10 (σὺ εἶ διδάσκαλος ;).

οὐκ ἔστιν] For the double negative, cf. Lk. xx. 27 (οἱ ἀντιλέγοντες ἀνάστασιν μὴ εἶναι); He. xii. 19 (παρατίθεσαν μὴ προσθεῖναι). We are hardly justified in seeing any special force in the retention of "a redundant οὐ in a clause of indirect discourse depending on a verb meaning to deny" (cf. Burton, N.T. Moods and Tenses, p. 181, § 473).

Ἰησοῦς οὐκ ἔστιν ὁ Χριστός] The following clause shows that ὁ Χριστός has come to mean much more than the Jewish Messiah. It includes a special relationship to God which was not a necessary part of Jewish Messianic expectation.

It is not easy to determine how far there is any special reference in the phrase, as used here, to the separation of Jesus from the Christ, according to the Cerinthian, or Gnostic, distinction of the human Jesus from the higher being, or "aeon," according to later Gnostic terminology, who descended on Jesus at the Baptism, and left Him before the Passion. It may well include such a reference, without its meaning being thereby exhausted. The "master-lie" is the denial of the true nature of the Incarnate Christ, as the writer and his fellow-Christians had come to know Him. Cerinthianism may be included, but Cerinthus is not ὁ ἀντίχριστος. And there is no reason for assuming that the many Antichrists, in whose appearance the writer sees the fulfilment of the saying "Antichrist cometh," all taught exactly the same doctrine.
οὗτος] The liar, who denies the truth of the Incarnation. Cf. Jn. i. 2, 7, vi. 46, vii. 18, xv. 5; 1 Jn. v. 6. 20; 2 Jn. 7, 9. The reference of οὗτος in this writer is always to the subject, as previously described.

ὁ ἀντίχριστος] The writer spiritualizes, if he does not altogether depersonalize, the popular conception. The spirit of Antichrist finds its fullest expression in the denial of Father and Son. The writer is not specially interested in the literal fulfilment of the legend. He would probably have met curious questions on the subject with the answer, ἐν τούτῳ ὁ λόγος ἐστίν ἀληθινὸς ὅτι ᾿Αντίχριστος ἔρχεται. πολλοὶ πλάνοι γεγόνασιν, οἱ μὴ ὄριζον τὸν Ἱησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα, or words to the same effect.

ὁ ἀρνούμενος κ.τ.λ.] Cf. Introduction, p. xlii. Recent writers like Wurm (Die Irrlehren Bibl. St. viii.) and Clemen (in ZNTW vi. 3, 1905, p. 271 ff.) are right in insisting on the importance of this and the following clause in determining the character of the false teaching combated in these Epistles. But the clauses do not compel the conclusion that the false teachers agreed with the writer in their doctrine of God, and differed only in their Christology. The writer sees in their Christological views the starting-point of their errors, and he points out that these views involve wholly false conceptions of God, and debar those who hold them from any true intercourse or conscious communion with the Father. He certainly draws from their Christology the conclusion that they “have not the Father.” But these words would apply to any teachers who claimed to have special and unique knowledge of the Father, not only to those whose views on the subject agreed with the views of the writer. There is nothing in the words to exclude a reference to Cerinthus, or similar teaching, although he held the Creator of the World to be “uirtus quaedam ualde separata et distans ab ea principalitate quae est super universa, et ignorans eum qui est super omnia Deum” (Iren. 1. xxvi. 1). It is therefore quite possible that a polemic against Cerinthus is included, even if we regard Irenaeus, rather than the reconstructed Syntagma of Hippolytus, as giving the truer account of Cerinthus’ teaching.

The words would have special force if one of the most prominent of the false teachers had put forward the view that the giver of the Law, or the God of the Jews, was only one of the ἄγγελοι κοσμοποιοί, and not the supreme God. Such an one certainly denied not only the Son, but the Father as revealed by the Son.

But the writer is not concerned with the details of a system. He is dealing with the general tendency of certain types of teaching. And his argument is that since all true knowledge of God comes through the revelation of Him made by Jesus Christ, before and by means of the Incarnation, those who reject this revelation in its fulness can have no conscious communion (ἔχειν) with the Father whom He revealed, whatever superior knowledge of God, as the Father of all, they may claim to possess.

23. ἔχειν] "As one who enjoys the certain possession of a living friend." Cf. 2 Jn. 9.1

Δόμισθαν] For the stress laid on ἀρνεῖσθαι and ὁμολογεῖν, cf. Jn. i. 20, ix. 22, xii. 42.

24. ὑμεῖς] For the construction, cf. Jn. vi. 39, viii. 45, x. 29, xvii. 2, 24. The ὑμεῖς is placed in emphatic contrast with the Antichrists whose true position has been made manifest. The readers only need to make sympathetic use of what they already possess. The truth which had always been theirs must be given full scope to abide and grow, and it will supply the answer to all new difficulties as they arise. It will enable them intuitively to reject all that is not on the line of true development.

ἀπ᾽ ἀρχῆς] Probably refers to the beginning of their life as Christians. It may, however, include what many of them had heard in the Jewish synagogue. The true message "began" with the beginning of the revelation contained in the Jewish scriptures.

ἐὰν ἐν ὑμῖν κιτιλ.] The form of the sentence is characteristically Johannine. By repetition, stress is laid on the importance of the teaching. It is an indication of the value set upon his words by the authoritative teacher, who knows the vital import of his message for those to whom he delivers it in their present circumstances. And the changed position of ἀπ᾽ ἀρχῆς emphasizes the approved character of the message. It reaches back to the very beginning.

1 Some editors connect this with ver. 22, putting a full stop at ὁ ἀντίχριστος and a colon at τὸν υἱόν, thus: "This is the Antichrist. He that denieth the Father (denieth) the Son also: every one that denieth the Son hath not the Father either." But the ellipse of the verb would leave us with a very awkward sentence. It should be noted, however, that the maker of the Bohairic Version understood the words in a similar sense. "This is Antichrist, because he that denieth the Father denieth also the Son." The same interpretation is necessitated by the reading of Ψ (see von Soden, Die Schriften des NT. p. 1860).

καὶ ὑμεῖς κ.τ.λ. The apprehension of the truth leads to real communion with God through His Son. As truth is appropriated their fellowship with the Divine grows and becomes more real. It is obvious that to the writer μένειν means something more than "standing still." It is the "abiding" of the son who grows up in the house.

It is obvious that to the writer μένειν means something more than "standing still." It is the "abiding" of the son who grows up in the house.

25. αὐτὴ has been interpreted as referring either backward, to the abiding in the Son and in the Father; or forward, to the eternal life. In favour of the former it has been urged that the Gospels contain no definite promise by Christ of eternal life which would justify the latter interpretation. But there are many passages in the Fourth Gospel which clearly imply such a promise. And the reference forward is in accordance with the writer's style. Cf. i. 5, etc. In either case the meaning is much the same, whether the promise is of eternal life, or of abiding communion with the Father and the Son. In the writer's view, eternal life "consists in union with God by that knowledge which is sympathy" (Westcott). Cf. Jn. xvii. 3.

αὐτὸς] Christ. Cf. iii. 3, and other passages.

(4) 26, 27. Repeated assurance of the readers' knowledge of the Truth.

26. ταῦτα] What has been said about the false teachers, and how the danger can be detected and met (18–25). The reference to the whole section is far more natural than to the exhortation to "abide" only (ver. 24 f., cf. Weiss). The words are not aimless. They serve to close the subject, and in connection with what follows to account for the brevity of his treatment of it. The writer has only to call to their remembrance the essential features of their own faith, and the grave issues raised by the antichristian teaching. The chrism which they have received will enable them to do the rest for themselves. They are in possession of all that is necessary for self-defence, if they use the power which has been given to them.

ἔγραψα] Cf. ver. 14. The clearness of the reference here points to the most probable meaning of that verse. There is no need to suppose (with Karl) that there is a reference to a former Epistle, which had been misunderstood, through the readers applying to the whole Church what had been said with reference only to the guilty members, who had now "gone forth."

πλανώντων] The danger is present and real, but the use of the present tense does not determine the extent to which the opponent's efforts had met with success. Cf. Rev. xii. 9.

27. καὶ ὑμεῖς] For the nominative absolute, cf. ver. 24. The position of ὑμεῖς is significant. The readers must meet the attempts to lead them astray by efforts on their own part. Warning and exhortation are of no avail without their active response.

απ' αὐτοῦ] From Christ, who is thought of as the source of the anointing, according to His promise to His disciples (Jn. xiv.). Throughout this passage, with the probable exception of ver. 29, αὐτός seems to refer to Christ. This is the customary usage of the Epistle, except where the context determines otherwise.

χρείαν ἔχετε] Cf. Jn. ii. 25, xvi. 30; and with the infinitive, Jn. xiii. 10.

ίνα] One of the many instances of the purely definitive use of ινα. Attempts to find in it any telic force produce altogether forced interpretations.

The gift of the Spirit which they received when they were baptized into Christ's name was an abiding gift (cf. Jn. i. 33). Its teaching is universal, it covers the whole ground where instruction is needed, and it is true. It is not the lie which the Antichrists have made of it. And though there was need of growth and development, all that was necessary and true was already contained implicitly in the teaching which they had received at the beginning. What they were taught at the first gave the standard by which all later developments must be measured. Their rule of life and thought, in accordance with which they "abide" in Christ, is the true teaching of the Spirit, which they received from the first days of their conversion. They must abide "as He taught them." The earliest teaching had not been superseded by a higher and altogether different message, as the Gnostics would have it. They needed no further teaching. What they had received covered the necessary ground. It was true. It had not been superseded by deeper truths.

If this is the writer's meaning, the second part of this verse (ἀλλ᾽ ὡς . . . αὐτοῦ) forms only one sentence: μένετε ἐν αὐτῷ ὡς . . . διδάσκει, καὶ ἀληθὲς ἐστὶν . . . καὶ καθὼς ἐδίδαξεν. The method of their abiding is characterized in three ways. They dwell in Christ, (i.) in accordance with the teaching which they have received, (ii.) which is sufficient, and true, (iii.) and permanent, never having been altered or superseded (διδάσκει περὶ πάντων, ἀληθὲς, καθὼς ἐδίδαξεν), though they are, or ought to be, continually learning more of its meaning.

It is, however, possible to divide the sentence and make καὶ ἀληθὲς, etc., the apodosis to ὡς τὸ αὐτοῦ κιτιλ. "As the unction teaches all that you need to know, so it is true and no lie. And as He taught you from the beginning, you abide in Him (or possibly you abide in the teaching which was taught you from the beginning). You have not to learn a new and better Christianity."

But the introduction of an apodosis by καὶ is not in the writer's style, and the result is a very weak climax. "The teaching you have received is not only comprehensive, it is true and not false." On the other hand, if καθὼς is taken as resumptive, we get a natural sequence, which is quite suitable to the context and the writer's general thought. The unction which they received gives a teaching which is comprehensive, true, homogeneous. The later lessons grow out of the earlier, which need not be unlearned. To abide in Christ is to live by the lessons which were first learned, the import of which has grown with the growth of their experience and spiritual intelligence. Some Latin texts make ἐν αὐτῷ ὡς τῷ χρίσματι: ver. 28 shows that it must mean "in Christ."

ἀλλ᾽ ὡς] The reading ἀλλά is obviously a correction to simplify a difficult sentence.

μένετε] may be either indicative or imperative. The preceding μένει strongly supports the former alternative. Cf. ver. 29; Jn. v. 39, xii. 19, xiv. 1, xv. 18, 27, where we have a similar doubt.

ψεῦδος] not ψευδές, which falls short of it, in much the same way as in English "the statement is false," would differ from "the whole thing is a lie."
28, 29. These verses are transitional, and it is doubtful whether they should be attached to the preceding or the following section. The "aphoristic meditations" of this Epistle do not always lend themselves to sharp division.

28. The need of constancy, and its reward. Confidence in the presence of the Judge.

28. καὶ νῦν] can hardly be taken as temporal, the exhortation to abide being specially needed in view of the nearness of the Parousia, which is expected in the immediate future, at the end of the last hour, which has already struck. The general use of the phrase seems to be to introduce a statement, especially a prayer, exhortation, or command, which is regarded as the necessary deduction from the requirements of present circumstances. "Since the case is so," "such being the case," would perhaps bring out the meaning most clearly by paraphrase. Cf. Jn. xv. 5; Ac. iii. 17, vii. 34 (= Ex. iii. 10), xiii. 11, xx. 22, 25, xxii. 16, xxvi. 6; 2 Jn. 5. Contrast Jn. xi. 22. Cf. also Ac. v. 38, xvi. 37.

ΤΕΧΝΙΑ] The term of affection, which appeals to their common (spiritual) nature, is used to enforce the exhortation. Cf. vv. 1, 12; Jn. xiii. 33; Gal. iv. 19; 1 Jn. iii. 7, 18, v. 21.

μένετε ἐν αὐτῷ] The words are resumptive of ver. 27. What is there stated as a fact (indic.) the writer now repeats as an exhortation. He would have them continue in that which they have. And their greatest possession is their personal fellowship with their Master. The strength of the Society lies in the personal relationship of the members to the Head.
The use of φανερωθῇ, and of παρουσία in the next clause, make it almost certain that the reference of ἐν αὐτῷ is to Christ, in spite of the difficulties raised by the next verse.

The nearness of the day affords a new motive for the effort to which they are urged. The nearer the Parousia of their Lord the greater the need of constancy. As soon as the last hour has run its course, the Master will appear, and will look for workmen who need not to be ashamed.

The signs of the time are clear. Events have shown that it is the "last hour." The form of conditional used (ἐάν, c. subj.) introduces a pure possibility, without any hint as to the degree of its probability. If that happens which, as circumstances have shown, may befall them now at any moment, they must be in a position not to be ashamed, when the object of their longing expectation is there.

The verb is used of the "manifestation" of the works of God (Jn. ix. 3), and Christ is said to have "manifested" His name. It is never used directly of God in the N.T. Whether the "manifestation" is to the eye of the body or of the mind has to be determined by the context. The word would seem generally to carry the suggestion that the appearance is not only seen but understood, or capable of being understood, in its true significance.

The writer would hardly speak of the Second Coming of Christ as a manifestation of the Father, though doubtless he expected that through it men would learn much about God not known before (cf. Weiss).

It was natural that the rather abrupt should have been altered to the more usual εξώμεν (cf. Jn. iii. 21, iv. 17, v. 14; Eph. iii. 12; He. x. 19, and contrast He. iii. 6). But the charge involves a slight loss of force. It is the fact of possession, not its continuance, that the writer would naturally emphasize.

παρουσία is used especially of freedom or boldness of speech, in accordance with its etymological meaning. But it has acquired the more general meaning of confidence, as here. Cf. Lightfoot’s note on Col. ii. 15. It is a favourite word of the writer’s, who is responsible for 13 out of the 31 instances of its use in the N.T. In some of these passages the idea of “publicity” is suggested, but in probably every instance that of “boldness” or “confidence” is really most prominent. For its use in the LXX, cf. Lv. xxvi. 13; Job xxvii. 10; Pr. i. 20, xiii. 5; 3 Mac. vii. 12; for the corresponding verb, cf. Job xxiii. 26; Ps. xi. 6, xcviii. 1. As a rule it occurs in renderings which paraphrase the Hebrew, but in Lv. xxvi. 13 it is used to translate παρρησία, uprightness. “I made you to go upright,” i.e., as free men, is translated, or rather paraphrased, ἤγαγον ὑμᾶς μετὰ παρρησίαν. The passages which best illustrate its use here are Job xxvii. 10, μὴ ἔχει τινὰ παρρησίαν ἐναντίον αὐτοῦ; and Job xxiii. 26, ἐίτα παρρησιασθῆση ἐναντίον Κυρίου. Cf. also Test. Rub. iv. 2, ἄχρι τελευτήσοι τού πατρός μου οὐκ εἶχον παρρησίαν ἀπενίσατε εἰς τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ.

καὶ μὴ αἰσχυνθῶμεν κ.τ.λ. Cf. Pr. xiii. 5, ἀσεβῆς δὲ αἰσχύνεται καὶ οὐκ ἔχει παρρησίαν. The idea would seem to be that of withdrawing ashamed from His presence, shrinking back from a sense of guilt. In this case the word is used as a middle rather than a passive. Cf. 1 P. iv. 16, εἰ δὲ ὡς Χριστιανός, μὴ αἰσχύνετο. For the phrase, cf. Sap. Sir. xxi. 22 ff. ποὺς μωροῦ ταχὺς εἰς οἰκίαν, ἀνθρώπους δὲ πολύπειρος αἰσχυνθῆσεται ἀπὸ προσώπου. άφρων ἀπὸ θύρας παρακόπτει εἰς οἰκίαν, ἀνὴρ δὲ πεπαιδευμένος εἴπο στήσεται. Cf. προσέχετε ἀπὸ and φυλάσσεσθε ἀπὸ.

He who “abides in Him” will have no cause to shrink away abashed from the Presence of the Judge, but may await His verdict with confidence as an ἐργάτης ἀνεπαίσχυντο (2 Ti. 1.15). ἐν τῇ παρουσίᾳ] Here only in the Johannine writings. In the N.T. the use of the word with reference to the Second Coming is confined to Mt. xxiv., the earlier Pauline Epistles (1, 2 Co., 1, 2 Th.), James and 2 Peter.

Very interesting light has been thrown on the Christian use of παρουσία by the discoveries of papyrus documents and other sources of common Greek. Cf. Deissmann, Licht von Osten, p. 268 ff. As he points out, the use of the word is best interpreted by the cry, “See thy King cometh unto thee.” From the Ptolemaic period to the second century A.D. there is abundant evidence that in the East the word was the usual expression for the visit of a King or Emperor. In Egypt, special funds were raised by taxation to meet the expenses of such visits. In Greece a new era was reckoned from the visit of Hadrian. The earliest mention is rightly interpreted by Wilcken (Griech. i. p. 274 ff.), ἄλλου (σε στέφανον) παρουσίας ἀβ’ to refer to the collection made to provide a crown to be presented on the occasion of the visit; and in the Tebtunis Papyri (48. 9 ff.) there is an interesting description of the efforts made by the village elders in connection with the expected visit of Ptolemy II.
II. 28, 29.] NOTES ON I JOHN 67

(B.C. 113), καὶ προσεδρεύοντον διὰ τε νυκτὸς καὶ ἡμέρας μέχρι τοῦ τοῦ προκειμένου ἐκπληρώσαι καὶ τὴν ἐπιγεγραμμένην πρὸς τὴν τοῦ βασιλέως παρουσίαν ἄγοραν π. . . . The same usage is found in Asia; cf. Dittenberger, Sylloge, 226. 85 f. τὴν τε παρουσίαν ἐμφανισάτων τοῦ βασιλέως (3rd cent. B.C.). The word is also used of the appearance of the god Asclepios in his temple (Dittenberger, Sylloge, 803. 34, τὰν τε παρουσίαν τὰν αὐτοῦ παρενεφάνιξε ὃ Ἀσκλάπιος. In Latin, Adventus was used in the same way. Cf. the coins struck to commemorate Nero’s visit to Corinth, Adventus Aug. Cor. Altars were also erected to commemorate visits of members of the Imperial family, as in Cos, in memory of the visit of C. Caesar (A.D. 4). The word was naturally used by Christians of the advent of their King, whether they thought of the Coming as a first visit, the earthly life having been merely a condescension in which He appeared in humility and not as Messiah, or as a second visit. Ἐπιφάνια seems to have been similarly used of the visits of the Emperor. Many of the words and titles which Christians loved to use of their Lord had a special significance as protests against the blasphemy of the popular Emperor Worship.

29. Doing righteousness, the sure sign of the new birth.

29. In thought this verse is closely connected with the preceding. The ground of the appeal to “abide in Him” was their expectation of the speedy return of their Lord in glory, and their desire to be able to meet Him with confidence and joy, and not to have to shrink away abashed from His presence. This naturally raises the thought of the conditions which would make such a meeting possible. Those only who are His own can look forward with unclouded confidence, and His own are those who share His qualities, especially those which characterize the Judge, righteousness and justice. The doing of justice is the sure sign, and the only sign, that they are “born of Him.” And so the meditation passes over to the next subject on which the writer wishes to dwell, the being born of God.

ἐὰν εἰδήτε The intuitive knowledge of what God, or Christ, is, makes it possible for those who possess it to learn by the experience of life (γενώσκειν) what are the true signs of being “born of Him.” To act in accordance with those qualities which correspond to His nature is the only certain sign of true fellowship with God, which is the result of the Divine begetting.

ἐάν] A protasis introduced by ἐάν, c. subj., does not necessarily present the fact as uncertain. If the condition is fulfilled, the results follow. No hint is given as to the probability of fulfilment.

dίκαιος ἐστιν] It is very difficult to determine whether the subject of this word is God or Christ. On the one hand, a change of reference between vv. 28 and 29 would be very awkward, if not impossible; and it is really certain that ἐν αὐτῷ, ἀπ' αὐτοῦ, and αὐτὸν in ver. 28 must refer to Christ. No other explanation of ἐὰν φανερωθῇ and παρουσία is natural, or even possible. And these considerations almost compel us to refer δίκαιος to Christ. On the other hand, a change of reference in the verse itself is still more difficult, at any rate at first sight; and Johannine usage is almost decisive in favour of referring εξ αὐτοῦ γεγεννησαι to God. To be “born of God” is a favourite phrase of the writer's (cf. Jn. 1. 13), especially in this Epistle (iii. 9, iv. 7, v. 1, 4, 18), whereas he never uses the expression “be born of Christ.” He does, however, speak of being born of the Spirit; and the language of the Prologue to the Gospel, ἐδωκεν αὐτοῖς εξουσίαν τέκνα θεοῦ γενέσθαι (Jn. i. 12), the subject οἵ ἔδωκεν being the Logos, suggests a sense in which being “born of God” might also be regarded as being “born of Christ,” who is always thought of as being and giving the life of God which comes to men.

It is more satisfactory to avoid any solution of the difficulty which might seem to presuppose a confusion of thought between God and Christ in the mind of the writer. Our inability to determine his exact meaning was probably not shared either by the writer or his readers, whose minds were full of the truth that Christ is God revealed to man.

If, therefore, a change of reference is impossible, the whole verse is best referred, as in Bede, to Christ. The conception “born of Christ” is not antagonistic to the Johannine lines of thought, though the expression is not found elsewhere. We must, however, remember that abrupt changes of subject were natural to Hebrew thought and expression which are almost impossible in Western language. Their occurrence in the O.T. is too frequent to need illustration. And it is quite possible that the expression εξ αὐτοῦ γεγεννησαι may have become stereotyped for the writer and his circle, who would immediately interpret it as meaning “born of God.” To a mind steeped as the writer's was in the thoughts of God and Christ, αὐτός and ἐκεῖνος had perhaps become almost proper names; the context or the special phrase used would make it perfectly clear to the writer, and to his readers as well, what was meant.

πᾶς . . . γεγέννηται] The doing of righteousness is the sign of the birth from God and its effect,—an effect which nothing else can produce, and so a certain sign. The more logical order would have been, "He that is born of God doeth righteousness."

γεγεννηται] γεγεννηται λ' 31. 69* 177* asc al. mult. syr.: + καὶ νῦν αὐτοῦ ὁ ἀμαρτίαν οὐκετι ὁ ὁπραται ὁ δὲ ποιῶν τὴν αὐτοῦ ὁ ὁπραται νῦν αὐτοῦ ὁ ὁπραται νῦν αὐτοῦ 1c 325 (2).

ADDITIONAL NOTE.

Though the name Antichrist occurs first in this Epistle in extant literature, the Epistle itself throws no light on its meaning. The conception cannot be explained from the N.T., or even from the Bible alone. The researches of Bousset and others have demonstrated the existence of a more or less definite Antichrist legend, independent of the N.T., and common to Jewish and Christian apocalyptic expectation, of which use is made in several N.T. writings. The legend cannot be explained on historical lines; it received modifications from time to time in consequence of definite historical events, and the experiences of Jews and Christians at different periods. But it always had an independent existence. Historical events modified the expectations for the future which find expression in its terms, but they did not create it. Its origin is probably to be traced to the wide-spread myth of a primeval monster, consisting of, or inhabiting, the waters and the darkness, which was subdued by the God of creation, but not destroyed, and which would again raise its power against the God of heaven in a final conflict before the end of all things. This tradition, especially in its Babylonian form of the cleaving of Tiāmat, the Sea-monster, by Marduk the son of Ea, who divided its carcase into two and formed the sea and the heavens, was well known among the Hebrews, and has left its traces in several passages of the O.T. It may be quoted as given by Gunkel from the cuneiform inscriptions (Schöpfung und Chaos, p. 21). "In the beginning, before heaven and earth were named, when as yet the ‘Urvater’ Apsû, and the ‘Urmutter’ Tiāmat, mingled their waters, when none of the gods had been created, no name named, no fate determined, then first the gods came into being. They were named Luḥmu and Laḥamu, Asnar and Kisar, and last Anu. (The next sentences are destroyed, but to judge from what follows they must have contained the account of the origin of the gods of the Upper World and of the Deep.) Then the myth relates how Tiâmat, the mother of the gods, together with all the Powers of the Deep, rebelled against the Upper Gods. The only extant part of this is a conversation between Apsû and Tiâmat, describing their plan against the gods. Apparently the origin of light was described in connection with this rebellion.

Next follows the description of the war between Tiâmat and the gods. On the one side Ansar appears as leader. Anu, Ea, and his son Marduk are also mentioned. Luhmu and Lahamu appear in the background. On the other side is Tiâmat, who has gained over some of the “gods” to her side. She created eleven fearful monsters, and placed the god Kingu as leader over them, whom she took for her husband, and laid on his breast the “amulet.” Against this host Ansar sent forth first Anu, then Ea; but Anu withdrew, and Ea was frightened and turned back. Finally, he betook himself to Marduk, Ea’s son, one of the youngest of the gods. Marduk declares that he is prepared to go forth against Apsû and Tiâmat, but he will only consent to be the avenger of the gods if they in full assembly ratify his authority as equal with their own. The assembly is called, and the destiny of Marduk is determined. His power shall be without equal, and his dominion shall be universal. His word shall have the magic power of calling things into being and causing them to disappear. And as a sign of this a cloak is placed in their midst, which at Marduk’s word disappears and appears again. The story next tells of Marduk’s arming. His weapons are bow and quiver, a sickle-shaped sword, and a weapon which he receives from the gods as a present, apparently the thunderbolt, represented as a trident. He has also a net, the present of Anu, and all the winds accompany him as confederates. Armed for the fight, he goes forth on his chariot drawn by terrible animals.

As he approaches Kingu, and the gods, his helpers, who accompany him, Marduk challenges Tiâmat to the combat, “Come hither, I and thou will fight.” When they fought the wise among the gods caught Tiâmat in the net. Through her opened jaws he sent the hurricane, and filled her belly with fearful winds. Then with the crescent sword he cut through her body. He cast her corpse away and stood upon it. Then Marduk overcame the gods, her helpers; he broke their weapons, and cast them into the net. So, too, he made fast the eleven creatures. Kingu met the same fate. Marduk tore from him the “amulet,” and placed it on his own breast. Then he turned to Tiâmat again. He split her head, and caused the north wind to carry her blood to hidden places. The gods, his fathers, offer presents to the victor.

Then was the Lord appeased. He divided the body of Tiamat into two parts. Of the one part he made the vault of heaven, and placed before it bars and watchers, that the waters should not stream forth. He placed the vault of heaven over against the primeval ocean, and built the heavens as a palace, corresponding to the primeval ocean, conceived of as a palace. Then Marduk created the stars, the sun and the moon, and the other planets; he placed the stars of the zodiac, and determined the course of the stars and the twelve months. The following tablets are lost; there is extant only a small fragment which deals with the creation of animals, in which these classes of land animals are distinguished, cattle, wild animals, and reptiles. The myth closes with a hymn in honour of Marduk, to whom are given names which celebrate his power as Lord of all, “as sheep may he tend the gods, all of them.”

There are many traces of this or similar myths to be found in the O.T., though the number of them may have been exaggerated by Gunkel. The most important are perhaps Is. ii. 9 f.; Ps. lxxxix. 10 ff.; Job xxvi. 12 f., ix. 13; Is. xxx. 7 (especially if the pointing דועיי be adopted); Ps. xl. 5, lxxiv. 12-19; Is. xxvii. 1; Job xl. 25, xli. 26; Ezek. xxi. 3-6a, xxxii. 2-8. These passages suggest that such myths were popular in Israel, and used by prophets and other writers to illustrate and emphasize their warnings and teaching. The points of similarity between the Hebrew and Babylonian myths on which Gunkel lays stress are the following (p. 112 ff.). Originally the “all” was water. The primeval ocean was personified as a fearful monster. The Babylonian Tiamat corresponds to the Hebrew aynn, which is always used anarthrously as a proper name. The common Hebrew name for the monster Rahab may have its parallel in Babylonian myth, but this is not proved. Both myths represent the monster as a dragon, and with many heads. Other similar beings are mentioned, the “helpers” of the dragon, among whom one is prominent. In Babylonian myths, Kingu is associated with Tiamat; in Hebrew we find Rahab and Tannin, Leviathan and Tannin, Leviathan and Behemoth, Rahab and Naḥas Bariah. In Henoch (ch. lx.), Behemoth and Leviathan are represented as male and female, as are Kingu and Tiamat in the Babylonian story.

These powers of the deep are in the Babylonian legend opposed to the gods of the Upper World, among whom Marduk is predominant. Even in the Hebrew story the appearance of other gods seems occasionally to be referred to (Job xli. 25, xxxviii. 7; Ps. lxxxix. 7).
The monsters rebel against the Upper Gods, and claim the sovereignty of the World for themselves. In the Hebrew story the special trait of the opponents of Jahve is their overruling and rebellious pride.

Before Marduk's victory, other gods had attempted the fight. There is perhaps a similar reference in Job xli. 11, 25.

Then Marduk appears. His arming is described. He comes on a chariot with horses, armed with sword and net, or with the terrible weapons of the thunder god.

Before the fight there are shrieks of abuse or reproach. In the fight itself the victory is gained by wisdom rather than by strength. The "net" has its part to play. The helpers of the monster are overthrown, they bow beneath him. In the Babylonian story he "puts them to shame"; cf. Ps. lxxxix. 10; Job ix. 13.

The corpse of the monster is not buried. This is several times referred to in Hebrew. Out of it the God makes the world. In some forms of the Hebrew story the fruitfulness of land that before was waste is derived from the blood and the flesh of the dragon (Gunkel, p. 111). The Babylonian myth relates that Tiâmat was divided in twain—into the upper and lower waters. In Ps. lxxiv. 13 we hear of the dividing of the sea, paralleled with the breaking of the heads of the dragons, and in Job xxvi. 13 of the bars of heaven (LXX, κλεῖθρα οὐρανοῦ δεδοίκασιν αὐτόν). At any rate, in both stories the victory over the monster is followed by the creation of the world.

Whatever exact parallels may be drawn between the Babylonian myths and allusions to similar stories which may be found, or reasonably supposed to exist, in passages in the O.T., there can be little doubt that Hebrew mythology knew of some such fight between the God of their race and the primeval monster of the deep. One particular form in which the myth seems to have been known is of special interest in connection with the legend of Antichrist. In at least one version the Dragon or monster was represented as not destroyed, but overcome. According to Is. xxx. 7, it is "brought to rest."1 When God captured him, he "spake soft words," and became His servant for ever (Job xli. 3, 4). God "played" with him (Job xli. 5; Ps. civ. 26). He lay at the bottom of the deep, but he must obey God (Am. ix. 3). He could still be dangerous, so God set watchers over him (Job vii. 12). He is put to sleep, but he still could be "waked" (Job iii. 8, xli. 10). Bars were placed to prevent his breaking forth (7 Job xxvi. 13 LXX).

Thus the starting-point of the legend is probably to be found in the stories of the combat between God and the primeval monster, which was overcome and bound, but not killed; and which should once more break forth and rebel against God, to be overthrown in a final victory before the end of all things. But it took more definite shape in forms which reflected the experiences of the people at the hands of their enemies. Many of the passages which speak of the quelling of the sea describe also the subduing of the peoples who set themselves against God. In consequence of the sufferings of the people at the hands of their enemies, the doctrine was developed that Israel was indeed the chosen of God, but that for their sins they had been given over to the heathen powers; and this led to the expectation of a great final struggle with the World-Powers before the perfecting of the kingdom. This is clearly seen in Ezk. (xxxviii. 2, xxxix. 1, 6) in the prophecy of Gog, the prince of Magog, and the gathering of the Northern nations, regarded as types of the World-Power from which the final outburst against the people of the Lord should come. Zec. xii.—xiv. describes the final oppression of the people by the hostile powers. All nations are gathered against Jerusalem (xiv. 2), and the Lord appears on the Mount of Olives to save His people.

---

1 If Gunkel is right in pointing ἔφεκται θανόν as a passive participle.

The attempt of Antiochus iv. (Epiphanes—God manifest in human form) of Syria to suppress Judaism and to Hellenize the nation, naturally led to further development of the idea. The World-Power is no longer an instrument for punishment in Jahve's hands, but His opponent, who goes forth to destroy the centre of His kingdom. Whether the βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως of Daniel is to be interpreted as the "smoke of the heathen sacrifice in the Temple, ascending from the altar erected there to Zeus in Dec. 168" or not, the author of the book certainly describes the past and present history of God's kingdom in relation to the World-Powers in the light of the events of that period, and points forward to a speedy rescue, and the completion of God's work for His people.

The World-Power is presented first (ch. ii.) as a colossal image of gold, silver, brass, and iron, which is finally shattered by the stone broken off from the mountains without human intervention, and later under the imagery of the four beasts coming up from the sea. The opposition of the world—as presented in the four successive empires, the Chaldaean, Median, Persian, and Greek—is to culminate in the "horn" on the fourth beast's head, with "eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things,"—a clear reference to Antiochus Epiphanes. If the book was written at a time when the Maccabean successes had already driven out the idolatrous Zeus-worship from the Temple, the writer might easily expect a great victory and extension of the power of the opponent before the Divine intervention, when the judgment begins, the World-Power is overthrown, and dominion given to the "Saints," i.e. the members of the Jewish Church preserved through the great tribulation and cleansed by it. In Dn. vii. 13 we read that one like unto a son of man was brought before the Ancient of days, and dominion was given unto him, and a kingdom, that all people should serve him. As the idea of a personal Messiah became more prominent, the expectation of a single personal opponent was developed. But on this point (of a personal Messiah) Jewish apocalyptic varied frequently during the next two centuries.

In Nu. xxiv. 17 the "Star" which shall come forth out of Jacob . . . and break down all the sons of tumult must be noticed, and the Septuagint translation of ver. 7 is significant:

\[\text{ἐξελεύσεται ἄνθρωπος ἐκ τοῦ σπέρματος αὐτοῦ, καὶ κυριεύσει ἐθνῶν πολλῶν.}\]
\[\text{καὶ ὑψωθήσεται ἡ Γαών βασιλεία (εαυτοῦ A F), καὶ αὐξηθήσεται ἡ βασιλεία αὐτοῦ.}\]

\(\text{α′ κα \text{τ'} θ'} \text{have ὑπὲρ Τώρ, which is still clearer. The Hebrew θσσ was read as ἰων. The Septuagint translation seems to have been coloured by the expectations of Messiah and Antichrist.}\]

The Third Book of the Sibyllines (iii. 652), which is generally attributed to the Maccabean period, speaks of the advent of a King who shall make war to cease:

\[\text{kai tov' ἀπ' ἡλιοῦ θεὸς πέμψει βασιλῆα, ὃς πᾶσαν γαῖαν παύσει πολέμοι κακοί, ods mēn ἄρα κτείνας, ols o' ὄρκια πιστὰ τελέσας.}\]

But the storm is to burst from many points, and is directed against God's people and house, not against the Messiah. And there is no single opponent. Gog and Magog are the names of lands:

\[\text{ Cf. 319, αἰαὶ σοι, χώρα Γαών ἣδε Μαγώγ μέσον οἴσα Αἰθιόπων ποταμῶν.}\]

According to Sieffert, Palestinian pre-Christian literature has no personal anti-Messiah.

In the Book of Enoch xc. 16 it is predicted that other parts of the Macedonian Empire, under the leadership of Greeks, will gather themselves together against the people. "All the eagles and vultures and ravens and kites assembled together and brought with them all the sheep of the field (apostate Jews), and they all came together and helped each other to break that horn of the ram. 19. And I saw till a great sword was given to the sheep, and the sheep proceeded against all the beasts of the field to slay them; and all the beasts and the birds of heaven fled before their face"; but in xc. 56 ff. the appearance of Messiah is first described after the close of the wars. Cf. 37, “And I saw that a white bull was born, with large horns; and all the beasts of the field and all the birds of the air feared him, and made petition to him all the time.”

In the Psalms of Solomon (b.c. 90), Messiah Himself destroys the foes by the word of His mouth.

Cf. xvii. 27, ὀλοθρεῦσαι ἔθνη παράνομα ἐν λόγῳ στόματος αὐτοῦ (cf. Is. xl. 4), and generally the whole passage 23-36.

In the Fourth Book of Ezra, chs. xii., xiii., to which a Flavian date is assigned, and in which the fourth beast of Daniel is clearly identified with Rome, the heathen peoples are overcome by the Messiah, who comes out of the sea. Cf. xiii. 5, “Lo, there was gathered together a multitude of men, out of number, from the four winds of heaven, to make war against the man that came out of the sea.”

In the Apocalypse of Baruch (xl. 1, 2), statements in this passage are taken over to describe the destruction of the last godless king. “The last leader of that time will be left alive, when the multitude of his hosts will be put to the sword and be bound; and they will take him up to Mt. Sion, and My Messiah will convict him of all his impieties, and will gather and set before him all the works of his hosts. And afterwards he will put him to death.”

Thus in the Jewish literature which is unaffected by Christian modifications the development of the idea of Antichrist cannot be very clearly traced; but the idea is to be found there, gaining or losing ground in accordance with the perpetually shifting character of Messianic expectations.

It is easier to trace the development of the subject in Christian literature. The idea of the growth of self-seeking till it culminates in self-deification finds its natural sphere in Christian thought. And speculations about the spread of opposition to God and His Messiah are stripped of their national and political clothing and spiritualized. In the eschatological discourses of the Synoptic Gospels it is difficult to distinguish between original saying and subsequent interpolation and comment, even if we reject the view that they have their origin in a Jewish Apocalypse the contents of which have been put into the mouth of Jesus. But they are at least good evidence of eschatological views held by Christians at a comparatively early date. In Mt. xxiv. ff. there is no doctrine of a personal Antichrist. The βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως of Daniel, whatever be the exact meaning assigned to it by the speaker or by later interpretation, is connected with the approaching tribulations of the last days and the national sufferings of the Jews. The Son of Man, a title which seems to be definitely Messianic, at least in the Similitudes of Enoch, is represented as about to come on the clouds of heaven (cf. Dn. vii.). But the hostile peoples are still conceived of as God's instruments to punish. The "kingdom," however, is separated from the national fate of Israel. The "Son of man" is opposed, not as in Daniel by world-rulers who destroy the Jewish theocracy, but by false prophets and false Messiahs (Mt. xxiv. 5). Popular "Messianism" is rejected by Jesus in the history of the Temptation (iv. 1 ff.) and in the rebuke to Peter (xvi. 23). He condemns the selfish aspirations of national zealots (cf. Jn. vi. 15, x. 8, v. 43), though He can train the enthusiasm of such men to the better work of heralding the kingdom (Mt. x. 4).

These views were taken up into the Apostolic preaching, and form the basis of what S. Paul taught at Thessalonica. He combines them with several traits clearly borrowed from Jewish popular expectation. The doctrine of one single opponent, in whom all that is antichristian culminates, is clearly seen in his conception of the Man of Sin. Whether the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians is genuine in its present form or not, there can be little doubt that the picture drawn in the 2nd chapter is mainly Pauline. Its exact agreement with the circumstances of his time is remarkable: or, at any rate, a perfectly natural interpretation of all that is said there can be found if it is explained on these lines. The coming of Christ cannot be till the apostasy is fully developed, and the opposition to the Christ is consummated in the appearance of the Man of Sin, the Son of perdition, who opposes and exalts himself against all that is called God, and is worshipped, and sets up his throne in God's Temple. Apparently this "Man of Sin" is to be an apostate Jew. The mystery of lawlessness, which is already working, is clearly the Jewish opposition to the work of Christianity, of which S. Paul had been the victim in every place where he had proclaimed the Christ since his conversion, and which had been specially virulent at Thessalonica (Ac. xvii. 5; cf. 1 Th. ii. 15, 16). Throughout his career, S. Paul found in Jewish opposition the worst hindrance to the spread of the Gospel. It would reach its climax in the appearance of Antichrist. At present its working was restrained by the power of the Roman Empire (τὸ κατέχον), concentrated as it was in the person of a single ruler (ὁ κατέχων). Till a far later period of his life, he always found support and protection in the authorities of the Empire of which he was a citizen. It was an essential part of his conception of the last things that "So long as Rome lasts, lasts the World." This much is certain, whether or not we choose to see in ὁ κατέχων an allusion to the name of Claudius
But he was conscious of the weakness as well as the strength of the Roman position. And he expected its downfall, and the overthrow of all authority and law, during the time of stress which was to precede the “unveiling” of the Christ. The freaks of Caligula had brought this home to all thinking men. And in his picture of the Man of Sin, S. Paul borrows traits from the episode of Caligula’s attempt to set up his statue, in the guise of Zeus, in the Jewish Temple. Thus the opposition of Judaism, which had lost its opportunity when it crucified the Messiah, is the main factor in the war against the Christ. But heathen opposition had to be encountered as well, and in particular it had proved a serious obstacle at Thessalonica (1 Th. ii. 14); and this will account for any heathen traits in the picture of the opponent.

It may be worth noticing in this connection that the thought of Jewish opposition and unbelief may help to explain a difficult section of the Second Epistle to the Corinthians (vi. 14—vii. 1). If S. Paul is there thinking first of the evil effect of Jewish companionship, though heathen contamination is not altogether excluded (ver. 16), the want of connection between the passage and the sections which precede and follow is less pronounced. And in later Jewish literature Beliar is the name for Antichrist, whether he is conceived of as apostate Jew (Ascension of Isaiah) or Roman Emperor (Sibylline Oracles, iii. 63, ἐκ δὲ σεβαστηνῶν ἥξει Βελίαρ μετόπισθεν, unless, indeed, the passage indicates a Samaritan origin of Antichrist). It is at least probable that when S. Paul wrote this section of 2 Corinthians, he still thought of Antichrist as the person in whom Jewish opposition to the faith should find its consummation.

But, however this may be, it is at least clear that the passage about the Man of Sin in 2 Thess. is most naturally interpreted, if we suppose that S. Paul is developing a popular legend in the light of Christ’s teaching about the last things, his own experiences at the hands of his countrymen, the episodes of the desecration of the Temple by Antiochus and the attempt of Caligula to set up his statue within its precincts. Recent experiences and historical incidents have added new traits to a well-known popular conception. And both the legend and the events are needed to explain the picture.

The use of the Antichrist legend is equally clear in the Apocalypse. Gunkel has clearly shown the impossibility of interpreting the 12th chapter on purely historical lines. And many of the details recall most vividly the legend of the Sea monster, which shall once more raise war against the Lord’s anointed. It is very probable that a Jewish Apocalypse which itself borrowed traits from older mythological traditions to describe the birth of Messiah, born in heaven, caught up to the throne of God and hidden in the wilderness till the appointed time, has been incorporated by the seer, and adapted to the circumstances of Christ and the Church, the borrowed details in many cases being quite unsuitable to their new application, in order to comfort his readers with the thought that their sufferings are really but a stage in the working out of God's purpose for their final triumph.
That which is woe for the earth, is matter of rejoicing in heaven, when the Dragon is cast down, and the first stage in the process of his destruction is accomplished. The hostility of the Dragon to the Messiah, the consequent war between Michael and the Dragon and their respective hosts, the identification of the Dragon with the old serpent, the Devil and Satan, the deceiver of the whole world, and the Water cast out as a river to destroy the Woman, are all reminiscences of popular myths of which traces have been found throughout the O.T. and elsewhere in the New.

In ch. xiii. 1 the beast coming up out of the sea points the same way, though here the adaptation of the myth to the circumstances of Roman history are clear, whether the solution of the riddle of ΧΙ. 18 is to be found in the older guess of κράτος, and the sufferings of the Neronic persecution, or Deissmann's suggestion of Καισαρ θεός and the Emperor-worship of the time of Domitian, is preferred.

Perhaps the clearest use of the Antichrist legend is to be found in xiii. 11, where the "two horns like unto a lamb" of the beast that came up out of the earth, emphasize his attempt to deceive by pretending to be the Messiah.

The 17th chapter, which offers the clearest indications of the identification of the beast with Rome, now regarded by Christians as the great enemy, and no longer the restraining and protecting power which S. Paul found in the Empire, shows how the mythical figure gains new attributes in consequence of new experiences, but does not throw much light on the older myth.
But the gathering together of the nations, Gog and Magog, for the war in xx. 7, 8, recalls the earlier feature of the legend.

In the Epistles of S. John there is no real use of the legend itsel at all. They contribute nothing but the name to our knowledge of it. The writer refers to a popular legend which had formed the basis of Apostolic teaching, as in earlier times the prophets and psalmists had made use of similar mythological ideas to enforce the lessons which they had to teach. But the process of spiritualization is complete. The writer finds in the false teaching which is growing apace the fulfilment of the popular expectation of the coming of the great antagonist who is to lead the last and final opposition of the powers of the world to the kingdom of the Christ. Whether this opposition is soon to culminate in the work of a single opponent he leaves uncertain. It is not a matter which interests him. The mystery of lawlessness is already working in those who are inspired by the spirits who do not confess Jesus Christ come in flesh. In this the "word" Antichrist cometh is fulfilled. The writer's business is with the reality to which the legend points; with the legend itself he has but little to do.

It is unnecessary here to trace the further developments of the Antichrist legend in later Jewish and Christian expectation. They show a more or less definite, but continually shifting, popular tradition which took its start in the old myth of the Sea-monster overcome, but only confined and not destroyed, by the power of God, which should once more break its bonds, and make a last attack on the powers of light before the final establishment of the Messianic kingdom.

B. ii. 28–iv. 6.
Second presentation of the two theses, ethical and Christological, the two being discussed separately, but with express reference to their connection.
I. ii. 28–iii. 24.
The doing of righteousness, especially genuine brotherly love, the true sign of the Birth from God. Corresponding exhortation.
I. ii. 28–iii. 6.
The thesis, and the exhortation to recognize this truth, shown by the obligation, involved in the gift of Divine kinship and the hope of its completion, of self-purification. The wide prevalence of antinomianism. The incompatibility of knowledge of God and yielding to sin.
(a) ii. 28–iii. 3.
(b) iii. 4–6.
ii. 28–iii. 3.
The gift of Divine kinship carries with it the obligation to self-purification.
I. This verse is closely connected with the preceding. It is a meditation on the last words of that verse, ἐξ αὐτοῦ γεγέννηται. The writer is trying to restore the waning enthusiasm of his readers, and to recall them to their first love. He therefore reminds them of their high privilege and position. God has given them proof of His love. He has bestowed on them the rank and title of His children, sharers in His nature. And it is no mere title. It corresponds to real facts, if they will but realize them, and respond to them. And these facts are the cause of the hostile attitude of the world. Those who do not know God have no sympathy with those who share His nature.

An interesting parallel to this passage is found in Pirqe Aboth, iii. 22 (ed. Taylor, 1897), "Beloved are Israel that they are called children of God; greater love (was it that it) was made known to them that they are called children of God, as it is said, Ye are the children of the Lord your God" (Dt. xiv. 1). We may also compare and contrast (cf. Windisch, ad loc.) Philo, de confusione ling. 146 f. (Cohn, ii. p. 257) καὶ γὰρ εἰ μὴ ποταποὶ θεοῦ παιδεῖς νομίζεσθαι γεγοναμεν, ἀλλὰ τῶν τῆς Αἰειδοῦς οἰκόνομοι αὐτοῦ, λόγον τοῦ ἱερωτάτου. The emphasis on the direct relation of Christians to God is characteristic of the Epistle, though the writer conceives of this relationship as realized in and through Christ.

ἵδετε ποταμήν] Cf. Gal. vi. 11, ἴδετε πηλίκος ὑμῖν γράμμασιν ἐγράψα: and for the combination with ποταμός, Mk. xiii. 1, ἴδε ποταμοῖ λίθοι. In the N.T. ποταμός generally suggests surprise, and very often something of an admirable character (quotaem, Latt. verss.). Cf. Mt. viii. 27; Lk. i. 29, vii. 39. 2 P. iii. 11 (ποταμοῖς δεὶ υπάρχειν ὑμᾶς ἐν ἀγάπαις ἀναστροφαῖς;). The Latt. verss. never use εἰςας, ποταμός having lost its reference to place.

ἀγάπην] Love, not token of love. "The Divine love is, as it were, infused into them, so that it is their own, and becomes in them the source of a divine life."

δέδωκεν] is better supported than the aorist, and is intrinsically superior. The results of what they have received are permanent and abiding. Nowhere else in N.T. does ἀγάπην δίδοναι occur.

ὁ πατήρ] suggested by the following τέκνα θεοῦ. Cf. Rev. xxi. 7.

τέκνα θεοῦ κληθῶμεν] Another instance of the definitive τέκνα. It is difficult to find any "full telic" force here. God did not give His love to men in order that they might be called sons. The greatness of His love to them was manifested in this, that He allowed Himself to be called their Father. Cf. ver. 11, αὐτή ἐστιν ἡ ἀγγελία, ... ἐν ἀγαπῶμεν. According to the general usage of this Epistle and the Fourth Gospel, τέκνα θεοῦ emphasizes the community of nature as distinguished from the dignity of heirship. The "being called" includes the "being," but it is not synonymous with it. It lays special stress on the dignity of the Christian title and position.

καὶ ἐσμέν] An awkward parenthesis, which scribes naturally dropped, as in the Receptus, or adapted to the sentence, as in the Latin Versions, et simus. But it is in the author's style. Cf. the true text of Jn. i. 15, κέκραγεν λέγον—οὗτος ἐν δ ἐπίων—‘Ο δωσῶ μου ἐρχόμενοι, and also Apoc. i. 6; 2 Jn. 2. And it also adds force to the sentence. “It is no mere empty title. It is a realized fact, though some are in danger of forgetting it.” Justin seems to have known this verse; Dial. c. Try. 123 (353 B), οὕτως καὶ ἡμεῖς ἀπὸ τοῦ γεννήσαντος ἡμᾶς εἰς θεὸν Χριστοῦ,—καὶ θεοῦ τέκνα ἀληθινὰ καλοῦμεθα καὶ ἐσμέν, οἱ τὰς ἐντολὰς τοῦ Χριστοῦ φιλάσσοντες.

διὰ τοῦτο] Because they knew not God. As usual, the reference of τοῦτο is to what follows. They do not recognize us, because they did not know God. Those who failed to know God (οὐκ ἔγνω) in creation, in history, in the revelation made by Jesus Christ, naturally fail to know those who are of like nature.

αγαπητοί] Cf. iii. 21, iv. 11, and contrast ii. 7, iv. 1, 7. The word is used here, not to introduce a new section, but to call attention to a further meditation on what has preceded. The writer uses the term which reminds his readers of their and his common share in the gift which God has given.

νῦν τέκνα θεοῦ ἐσμέν] Cf. καὶ ἐσμέν of the preceding verse. What they have at present justifies their full confidence for the future, which will bring the complete unfolding of that which is even now present, though its manifestation is hindered by the circumstances in which they are placed.
οὔπω ἐφανερώθη] For οὔπω with the aorist, where the writer is not looking back on a time separated by an interval from that of writing or speaking, cf. Mk. xi. 2 (οὐδείς οὔπω ἐκάθισεν); 1 Co. viii. 2 (εἰ τις δοκεῖ . . . οὔπω ἐγνώ); He. xii. 4 (οὔπω μέχρις αἵματος ἀντικατέστησε); Apoc. xvii. 10 (ὁ ἄλλος οὔπω ἦθεν), 12 (βασιλευάν οὔπω ἔλαβον). The statement denies that there has ever yet been a moment at which it could be said ἐφανερώθη, where the aorist would be either timeless, or expressive of what has just happened. There is no necessary reference to any occasion “on which the revelation might have been expected,” such as the manifestation of the Risen Lord (Westcott).

οἴδαμεν] We know enough to justify confidence even if no complete revelation has as yet been made. Great as are our privileges now, how far greater then! Nothing short of being like God in Christ. Contrast γινώσκομεν (ii. 3, 18, iii. 24, etc.): here no progress in knowledge is suggested: we are aware of the future likeness.

ἐὰν φανερωθῇ] May mean either (1) if it shall be revealed, i.e. our future condition (τί ἐσόμεθα), or (2) “if He shall be revealed,” i.e. Christ. The first is the more natural interpretation so far as grammar is concerned. It connects the words naturally with the preceding οὔπω ἐφανερώθη. And it gives an adequate meaning to the words. “If our future glory is revealed, it will be found to be not less than likeness to God, the open vision of whose glory shall transform us.” In favour of (2) is the use of φανερωθῇ of Christ in ver. 28 of the preceding chapter, and the general sense of the passage. Throughout the passage the writer’s thoughts are turned to the revelation of Christ in His glory at His Parousia. If He be manifested in His true glory, the vision will change us to His likeness. Cf. 2 Co. iii. 18, τὴν δοξὴν Κυρίου κατοπτριζόμενοι τὴν αὐτὴν εἰκόνα μεταμορφοῦμεθα ἀπὸ δοξῆς εἰς δοξήν: Col. iii. 4, ὁταν ὁ Χριστὸς φανερωθῇ . . . τότε καὶ ὑμεῖς σὺν αὐτῷ φανερωθήσεσθε ἐν δόξῃ. And if the use of φανεροῦσθαι in ii. 28 partly suggests this interpretation, in spite of the intervening οὔπω ἐφανερώθη, where the τί ἐσόμεθα determines the meaning of the verb, it must also be remembered that the language of soliloquy and meditation has to some extent its own rules. To one pondering over the future glory of the Son of God, in the light of the present revelation of the Risen Lord, which suggests so much more than it actually reveals, the words ἐὰν φανερωθῇ could probably have but one meaning. To us it would have been clearer if the subject had been definitely expressed. It does not follow that the same is true of the writer, or of those for whose sakes he is giving written form to his meditations. Very possibly they had often heard him meditate on the theme ἐὰν φανερωθῇ. He uses the word φανεροῦσθαι eighteen times, and in twelve Christ is the subject, though most of them refer to His manifestation in the flesh.

ὅτι] "Because we shall see Him as He is." What men saw of Jesus of Nazareth, when He manifested His glory under the limitations of human life, raised them to the position of τέκνα θεοῦ, in the case of all who received Him (Jn. i. 13). How much greater transforming power shall there be in the vision of Him as He is, no longer veiled by the conditions of earthly life!

It is possible to take ὅτι κ.τ.λ. as giving the proof of the knowledge (οἴδαμεν). We know that we shall be like Him, for we know that we shall see Him; and only the pure in heart shall see God. He is visible only to those who share His nature. Like is perceived by like alone. But if the writer had meant this he surely would have expressed himself differently. He often leaves not a little for his readers to supply. But he demands from them the use of spiritual insight rather than of mental acuteness. Weiss’ explanation is too ingenious for its context.

3. The possession of such a hope is the strongest incentive to absolute purity. The hope is not really grasped except by those whose striving towards this goal is eager and constant. The hope is not stated to be the necessary condition of the purity, but the purity is the necessary result of the hope. It is not denied that other causes may produce a similar result. But where such a hope really exists the striving after purity must follow. The Christian hope is incompatible with moral indifference. No one, not even the "Gnostic," is raised by it above the moral obligations. And the purity aimed at is absolute. The standard is nothing less than the perfected human life of the glorified Christ.

πᾶς] The use of πᾶς in this Epistle and in the Gospel is instructive. It generally sets aside the claims of some party or other who claimed special privileges or exemptions for themselves.
The form of expression emphasizes the thought of hope possessed and enjoyed as a sure possession (ἔχων ἐλπίδα being stronger than the simple verb), and which rests on the Christ, and is therefore surely and securely grounded. Contrast Ac. xxiv. 15, ἐλπίδα ἔχων eis τὸν θεόν, reaching as far as (Westcott). Cf. 1 Ti. iv. 10, v. 5. See Introduction, p. iv; also 1 P. i. 13, 21. ἐπ᾽ αὐτῷ must, of course, refer to Christ.

ἄναψέν Cf. Ex. xix. 10 f.; Nu. viii. 21; Jos. iii. 5; 1 Es. vii. 10, and also Jn. xi. 55. Those who appeared before God at the Jewish feasts were required first to purify themselves from all Levitical and ceremonial uncleanness. The hope of appearing before the presence of God, and of seeing Christ as He is, necessarily inspires its possessors with the desire of putting away every defilement which clouds the vision of God, even as the human nature of the Christ, made perfect through the discipline and suffering of earthly life, has even now been exalted to the unveiled presence of the Father.

καθὼς] He has attained, and those who hope to attain likewise will naturally spare no effort to follow the same path. But καθὼς suggests a pattern, rather than introduces a motive.

ἐκεῖνος] For the change of pronoun, cf. Jn. v. 39, and perhaps xix. 35. Throughout the Epistle ἐκεῖνος used absolutely refers to Christ. Cf. ii. 6 (note).

ἁγνός] For the difference between ἁγνός and καθαρός, see Westcott's note. Καθαρός seems to state the objective fact, ἁγνός emphasizes the subjective feeling. The Vulg. commonly has castus for ἁγνός, but here has sanctus.

τὴν ἀνομίαν] ἁνομία here is, of course, not the antinomianism of the "Gnostic." The condemnation of that would have

4. πᾶς] Cf. ver. 3 (note). In contrast with those who seek to cleanse themselves from all defilement, are set those who continue to do the sin which defiles and separates from God. There is no special class of illuminati, superior to the obligation to keep the moral law. The test of progress is obedience. Those who fail to do the will of God, to work out the best of which their nature is capable, are breaking the law of God, which is the law of their being. All sin is law-breaking; all falling short of the highest possible is disobedience to God's law for men, the law of self-realization after the pattern of the Christ. He that fails to do righteousness breaks the law.

τὸν ἀνθρώπον] ἀνθρώποι here is, of course, not the antinomianism of the "Gnostic." The condemnation of that would have required the converse of the statement here made, "All ἀνομία is sin." But the writer is undoubtedly thinking of the claim made by the superior "Gnostic," that he is at liberty to follow the leading of his own desires, without being under any obligation to the moral law, which is only binding on the ignorant and the inferior. The sins of which the writer is thinking are failures to fulfil the law of love, rather than grosser sins of the flesh, which are hardly, perhaps never, referred to in this Epistle. But whatever form they take, sinful acts are not matters of indifference. In the case of all men, even the most intelligent, they are transgressions of a valid law. He who stoops to them shows himself thereby to be no true τέκνον θεοῦ.

καὶ ἡ ἁμαρτία κ.τ.λ.] The καὶ adds a clause which carries the thought a step further. Not only is “doing sin” a violation of law, but sin in its very nature is a transgression of the law of God. It is the self-assertion of the finite against the eternal will of Him who has the right to claim absolute obedience.

tην τοῦ] om. 31.
η 2ο] pr. καὶ Ν* : (?) om. ἃ 200 (83).
estiν] + δὲ H Æ (N).

5. καὶ οἴδατε κ.τ.λ.] Not only does he who commits sin break a Divine law, but he stultifies the whole purpose of the Incarnation. Christ was manifested to men in His earthly life in order to take away sin, to destroy and remove it. And being sinless Himself, it was in His power to do so. To these two great incentives to self-cleansing, the purpose of the Incarnation, and the power of the Incarnate Christ, the writer can appeal as to part of the normal Christian consciousness, whether he includes himself (οἴδαμεν) or speaks only of his readers (οἴδατε).

ἐκείνος] Cf. ver. 3. The writer apparently sees no difficulty in using ἐκείνος and αὐτός in the same verse with reference to the same subject: though, of course, the case where ἐκείνος stands first is not strictly parallel to those in which it follows the use of αὐτός, as in ver. 3.

ἐφανερώθη] The word is used more frequently, as here, by the writer with reference to Christ's first coming, or manifestation, in the flesh. Cf. I Ti. iii. 16; I P. i. 20.

ἄρῃ] Take away, i.e. destroy. The Hebrew נָשָׁה is used in both senses of taking away and bearing. But it is differently translated into Greek in the two cases. Αἰρεῖν expresses the former, φέρειν the latter. Cf. Is. liii. 11, τὰς ἁμαρτίας αὐτῶν αὐτὸς ἀναίρεσθαι.

tὰς ἁμαρτίας] whether used absolutely, or with the addition of ἡμῶν, denotes the many acts in which the sin of humanity is expressed. The concrete expression is more forcible than the absolute (τὴν ἁμαρτίαν).

ἁμαρτία ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἔστιν] cf. Jn. vii. 18, ἀδικία ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἔστιν. The statement is made of the whole human life of the Christ (ἐστιν), and is not confined to the earthly part of it. In virtue of His sinlessness He can accomplish the purpose of the Incarnation; and the thought also suggests the means by which it can be accomplished, a thought which is further developed in the next verse. Cf. Augustine, “In quo non est peccatum ipse uenit auferre peccatum. Nam si esset in illo peccatum, auferendum est illi, non ipse auferret.”

οἶδαμεν & 40. 98 tol. sah. arm. boh-ed. Fulg.

οἰδαμεν Ν 40. 98 tol. sah. arm. boh-ed. Fulg.

eν αὐτῷ μένειν] As contrasted with εἶναι, μένειν perhaps suggests in this context the necessity of human effort.

οὐχ ἁμαρτάνει] Augustine has supplied the necessary modification, “In quantum in ipso manet, in tantum non peccat,” a sentence which Bede has incorporated in his Commentary (cf. Westcott’s note).

ἐώρακεν . . ἐγνωκεν] The vision and the knowledge have their abiding results. ὁρᾶν is used by the writer of spiritual vision. It cannot be restricted here (as by Weiss) to those who had actually seen the Lord in the flesh, ἐγνωκεν being added to meet the case of later disciples. Cf. Bede, “Visionem dicit et cognitionem fidei, qua iusti etiam in hac uita deum uidere delectantur, donec ad ipsam speciem apertae visionis eius in futuro preueniant, de qua supra dicitur, Quoniam uidebimus eum sicuti est,” a passage which is also based on Augustine’s comment, "est illuminatio per fidem, est illuminatio per speciem." If the two words are to be distinguished here, ὁρᾶν lays stress on the object, which appears and is grasped by the mental vision, γινώσκειν on the subsequent subjective apprehension of what is grasped in the vision, or it is unfolded gradually in experience.

2. iii. 7–18. Elucidation of the thesis (ethical), and earnest warning against those who would lead them astray. (a) 7–10. Further meditation on the Divine Birth. The opposite statement. He that sinneth is of the Devil. (b) 10–17. Clearer definition of sin as failure to love the brethren, and of its opposite, love.

7. The views of the false teachers were plausible, and there was imminent danger of some of the faithful being seduced. But the facts were clear. He, and he only, who shows the fruits of righteousness in what he does, is righteous. Righteousness is always known by its fruits. There are no heights of knowledge, or superior kinds of nature, for which action is a matter of indifference.

2. iii. 7–18. Elucidation of the thesis (ethical), and earnest warning against those who would lead them astray. (a) 7–10. Further meditation on the Divine Birth. The opposite statement. He that sinneth is of the Devil. (b) 10–17. Clearer definition of sin as failure to love the brethren, and of its opposite, love.

7. The views of the false teachers were plausible, and there was imminent danger of some of the faithful being seduced. But the facts were clear. He, and he only, who shows the fruits of righteousness in what he does, is righteous. Righteousness is always known by its fruits. There are no heights of knowledge, or superior kinds of nature, for which action is a matter of indifference.

2. iii. 7–18. Elucidation of the thesis (ethical), and earnest warning against those who would lead them astray. (a) 7–10. Further meditation on the Divine Birth. The opposite statement. He that sinneth is of the Devil. (b) 10–17. Clearer definition of sin as failure to love the brethren, and of its opposite, love.

7. The views of the false teachers were plausible, and there was imminent danger of some of the faithful being seduced. But the facts were clear. He, and he only, who shows the fruits of righteousness in what he does, is righteous. Righteousness is always known by its fruits. There are no heights of knowledge, or superior kinds of nature, for which action is a matter of indifference.

2. iii. 7–18. Elucidation of the thesis (ethical), and earnest warning against those who would lead them astray. (a) 7–10. Further meditation on the Divine Birth. The opposite statement. He that sinneth is of the Devil. (b) 10–17. Clearer definition of sin as failure to love the brethren, and of its opposite, love.

7. The views of the false teachers were plausible, and there was imminent danger of some of the faithful being seduced. But the facts were clear. He, and he only, who shows the fruits of righteousness in what he does, is righteous. Righteousness is always known by its fruits. There are no heights of knowledge, or superior kinds of nature, for which action is a matter of indifference.
8. διὰ τὴν ἁμαρτίαν ὁ ποιῶν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν] The contrast to 74. He whose whole course of action is the expression of “sin,” belongs to the Devil, from whom the life which animates him is derived, as the higher life which issues in righteousness proclaims its possessor a τέκνον θεοῦ.

ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου ἐστίν] Cf. Bede, “Non carnis originem ducendo ex diabolo sicut Manichaeus impurissime de cunctis credit hominibus: sed imitationem vel suggestionem peccandi sumendo ab illo, quomodo et nos filii Abrahae sumus facti, imitando fidem Abrahae,” a suggestive note, though it ignores the nearer illustrations of the context.

ἀπ᾽ ἀρχῆς] The meaning of ἀρχῆς has been variously interpreted. It has generally been understood either of (1) the beginning of “sinning,” i.e. the Fall of Adam, or events which preceded the first sin of man; or (2) the beginning of the existence of the Devil. His first act was one of sin. The uncertainty of both these interpretations has led Rothe and others to give the phrase a logical rather than a temporal meaning. “Satan sins, the author would say, ‘par principe,’ for the sake of sinning. Other sinners sin for the sake of another. In contrast to him all human sin is derived.” Whether the actual phrase can bear such an interpretation or not, the point of view of the readers has surely been overlooked. The writer must have intended a meaning which the words could suggest to them. The phrase must therefore be interpreted in accordance with Jn. viii. 44, i. 1; Gn. i. 1, etc. The attempt to assign a definite date, so to speak, is a mistake. “The earliest times spoken of in Genesis” would perhaps be the nearest popular paraphrase. “From the first” would give its meaning with fair accuracy. It denotes the earliest events which have any bearing on the point at issue. From the very first, long before the first actual sin of any man, “the devil sinneth,” and the course begun from the first has been continued ever since. All human sin, therefore, has its origin in what is external to the man who sins. It comes from an external source. It is not self-originated or part of man’s nature. As Westcott has said elsewhere, “There is no view of human nature so inexpressibly sad as that which leaves out the Fall.” As also F. D. Maurice has said, “There has been no period of the existence of human beings in which they have not been liable to the assaults of this Tempter.”

There is nothing in the passage to suggest that the writer held a “dualistic” view of the origin of evil, considering the Devil “an originally evil being”; but it is manifest that he believed in a personal Tempter. Cf. Jn. viii. 44.

eἰς τοῦτο ἐφανερώθη κ.τ.λ.] All such action is in direct opposition to the purpose of the Incarnation of the Son of God, who was manifested in the flesh in order to destroy the works of the Devil, i.e. the sins which he has introduced into the lives of men.
III. 8, 9.] NOTES ON I JOHN

λύσῃ] “destroy.” The word generally includes the suggestion of destroying, undoing or dissolving, that which forms the bond of cohesion. Cf. Jn. ii. 19, v. 18, vii. 23 (the Lord “dissolved” the Jewish sabbatical tradition by applying to the question the higher principle of the duty of restoring man to his true self). Windisch aptly quotes the λογίον of the Egyptian Gospel, ἥλθον καταλύσαι τὰ ἔργα τῆς θηλείας.

9. He who is begotten of God must be in character like God who begat him. Sin, which is of the Devil, finds no place in him.

ὁ γεγεννημένος] Compare and contrast Jn. i. 13, ἐκ θεοῦ ἐγεννήθησαν. Here the writer emphasizes not only the initial act, or the single act, but its permanent results.

ἁμαρτίαν οὐ ποιεῖ] Anarthrous and therefore qualitative. He does not do that which is sinful in character. But the absence of the article should not be pressed.

ὅτι σπέρμα] The seed which produces the new life in him (cf. Jn. i. 13), as a permanent and abiding factor. The interpretation which equates σπέρμα with the Word of God (“semen dei, id est uerbum dei,” Bede, from Augustine, who adds, “unde dicit Apostolus, Per Evangelium ego usos genui, i Co. iv. 15) receives some support from 1 P. i. 23; Ja. i. 18, but is hardly in accordance with the Johannine teaching, in which the Spirit is the author of the new birth (cf. Jn. iii.). Wohlenberg in an interesting paper has pleaded for the interpretation which identifies σπέρμα θεοῦ with God’s children collectively (cf. Jn. viii. 33, σπέρμα ᾿Αβραάμ). It has the advantage of referring αὐτοῦ and ἐν αὐτῷ to the same person (God’s children abide in Him), but it makes the following clause, οὐ δύναται . . . γεγένηται, very difficult both in grammar and sense. As Law has pointed out, the last clause must then have run (“and they cannot sin, because they abide in Him”). Still less can be said for Karl’s interpretation of the words as referring to Christ. Cf., however, Justin, Apol. 1. 32, where we perhaps have an echo of this.

οὐ δύναται κ.τ.λ.] The fact that he has been begotten of God excludes the possibility of his committing sin as an expression of his true character, though actual sins may, and do, occur, in so far as he fails from weakness to realize his true character. Cf.

1 Cf. Philo, De Zbéréet. 30 (Cohn, ii. p. 176), τὰ τοῦ θεοῦ σπέρματα.
2 οἱ πιστεύοντες αὐτῷ ἀνθρωποι ἐν οἷς οἰκεῖ τὸ παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ σπέρμα, ὁ λόγος.
Every τέκνον must reproduce the works of his father. In so far as any man is a τέκνον θεοῦ he “cannot” do the works of the Devil. The writer speaks, however, here as elsewhere, in the absolute language of the prophet rather than with the circumspection of the casuist. On the N.T. doctrine of Birth from God, see Windisch, p. 118.

10. ἐν τούτῳ] This may possibly refer to what has preceded, the not-doing or the doing of sin, which are the distinguishing characteristics of the classes into which the writer divides mankind. But it is more probable, and more in accordance with the writer’s usual custom, that the reference is to what follows, the achievement of, or the failure to achieve, righteousness and love (cf. ii. 3). For the construction, cf. the note on i. 4.

The object of the Epistle is to suggest practical tests. They must be practical and such as are easily applied. No statement is made to the effect that he who confines his love to his Christian brethren has completely fulfilled the law of Christ. The writer has a special object in what he says, and he writes in view of the failure in this respect of showing love to fellow-Christians, which was conspicuous in the case of the false teachers, in spite of their claims to intellectual and spiritual superiority. There is nothing inconsistent with the teaching of the Christ in laying special stress on the first stage in obeying it. The experience of a lifetime, and especially of his later years, would seem to have taught the writer the necessity of charity beginning at home.

εν τούτω] εκ τούτου Ἰά 20 35f (83).
πας] πρ. καὶ C+ aeth. ποιῶν δικαιοσύνην Σ Α B C K L P al. omnud cat. harl. tol. arm. cop. syr. aeth. Did. Thphyl. Oec.] ὁν δικαιοσύνην ἐκ τούτου Ἰά 66 (Ψ). An interesting “Western” variant, which can hardly claim to be original. The context requires the practical test of “doing.”
δικαιοσύνην καὶ τὴν AC Καὶ Ph al. fere.* Dam.
αὐτοῦ] “ οὐκ ἀγαπᾷ τὸν Οὐ 747 (το5).
11. The original message of the Gospel, nay, the whole history of God’s revelation of Himself to men from the earliest times, is summed up in the command to exercise mutual love. He therefore who does not love his brother shows thereby that he cannot be ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ.

αὕτη... ἵνα] The αὕτη, which refers to what follows, excludes the possibility of any “telic” force being retained by ἵνα here; cf. Jn. xvii. 3, and the close parallels in Jn. xiii. 34, xv. 12; i Jn. iii. 23, iv. 21, v. 16. See also 1 Jn. v. 3; 2 Jn. 5, 6; cf. note on i. 9. The declarative, or definitive, use of ἵνα to introduce the contents of a command, or the like, is fully established for S. John.

ἄγγελία] The message of the Gospel, of which the law of love is the basis. The reading ἐπαγγελία does not suit the context, and it is obviously due to the careless substitution of a commoner word. Except in this passage, ἄγγελία is found only once in the N.T. (1 Jn. 1. 5). On the other hand, ἐπαγγελία occurs 51 times, but only once in the Johannine writings (1 Jn. ii. 25).

ἡν ἠκούσατε ἀπὸ ἀρχῆς] The law of love was an essential part of the earliest presentation of the Gospel. It formed part of the earliest teaching which the readers had received. The contents, however, of ver. 12 suggest that in the words ἀπὸ ἀρχῆς the writer’s thought goes back to still earlier times. The earliest stories of the beginning of the race bear witness to the fatal consequences of disobedience to the law of love.

ινα αγαπᾶτε] ut diligatis boh ed. arm unc.: ϊνα αγάπατε Ἰά 113 (235).
The story of Cain is the typical example of the "want" of brotherly love. The form of the reference here is conditioned by what the writer has to say about the hatred which Christians must expect from the world. Men's deeds are the natural outcome of their character and inclinations. Evil deeds are the expression of a character which takes pleasure in what is evil. Righteousness must always provoke the hostile feeling of those whose delight is in evil. And feelings must sooner or later express themselves in action.

οὐ καθὼς] Cf. 2 Co. viii. 5, καὶ οὐ καθῶς ἐπιτίθησαμεν ἀλλὰ ἐαυτοῦς ἔδωκαν: Jn. xiv. 27, οὐ καθὼς ὁ κόσμος ἐδώκωσιν, and especially Jn. vi. 58, οὐτὸς ἐστιν ὁ ἀρτος ὁ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ καταβάς, οὐ καθὼς ἔφαγαν οἱ πατέρες καὶ ἀπέθανον, where the construction is irregular, as here. The comparison is incomplete in form. It may be paraphrased "the feelings of Christians for each other must not be like, rather they must be the exact opposite of, those of Cain, whose hatred of righteousness led him to the violent murder of his brother." Schlatter aptly quotes in illustration (p. 149), ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ ἦν ἡ καρδία καὶ ἐκ τοῦ ἅγιον ἐκ τοῦ πνεύματος. Schlatter 16. 126a.

ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ ἦν] Every man must draw his life and power from one source or the other. His deeds show to whom he belongs and has attached himself. The writer never denies the individual freedom of choice. He only traces things back to what he believes to be their ultimate spiritual sources.

ἐσφάξει] The verb always includes the idea of violence. In the N.T. σφάξει is found only here and in the Apocalypse. Cf. Apoc. vi. 4, ἤνα ἀλλήλους σφάξουσιν: 9, τῶς ψυχῶς τῶν ἐσφάγμενων διὰ τῶν λόγων τοῦ θεοῦ: xviii. 24, πάντων τῶν ἐσφάγμενων ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς. It is also used of the Lamb, and of the "head" of the beast (xiii. 3). In the LXX its most frequent use is sacrificial (cf. Gn. xxii. 10, of Isaac; Ex. xxix. 11; Lv. i. 5; Nu. xi. 22, etc.); but see also Jg. xii. 6 (A), σφάξουσιν αὐτούς ἐπὶ τὰς διαβάσεις τοῦ Ἰορδάνου: 1 K. xv. 33, ἐσφάξει Σαμούηλ τὸν 'Αγαγ ἐνώπιον Κυρίου: 1 Mac. i. 2, καὶ ἐσφάξει βασιλεῖς, etc.

χάριν τίνος] The violent deed was only the last expression of that antipathy which righteousness always calls out in those who make evil the guiding principle of their life. This view, that the cause of the murder of Abel is to be found in the character of Cain as manifested in his actions, is hardly in accord with the narrative of Genesis (iv. 8 ff.), but it is quite in keeping with the suggestions read into that narrative by the adherents of the allegorical method of exegesis. We may compare Philo's treatment of the subject, who finds indications of Cain's φιλανυτία in the fact that he only offered his sacrifice "after several days," and not at once, with the readiness which should distinguish the service of God; and that he offered of the fruits, not of the first-fruit. Cf. also He. xi. 4, where the stress is laid on the character of the sacrifices offered (πλείονα θυσίαν), rather than on the general character of all the actions of the two men.

13-16. The ground of the world's hatred of those who love, and the glory of love, which gives life, in Christ.

13-15. Those who can interpret aright the true meaning of the story of Cain and Abel will feel no surprise at the attitude of the world towards Christians. It only expresses the hostility which that which is good must always call out in that which is evil. Our love for the brethren assures us that we have already passed out of the state of hatred and death, and now abide in that of life. For life is love. He who does not love is still in the state of death. Every one who does not love his brother is a murderer, in the eyes of all to whom the true issues of things are manifest, even though he has so far stayed his hand from violence. And your common consciousness as men tells you that no murderer can have the higher life in him as a permanent and abiding principle of action.

13. ph θαυμάζετε] cf. Jn. iii. 7 (μὴ θαυμάσῃς), where the aorist emphasizes the immediate feeling aroused by a particular thought, or action, rather than the more permanent feeling called out by what is continuous. Cf. also Jn. v. 28, where the form of sentence refers to the continuous feeling, not to the momentary surprise, which the fact that the hour was coming, when all the dead should hear the voice of the Son of God, might occasion. The construction with the present imperative is the usual construction in the Johannine writings, the aorist subjunctive being only used in the passage quoted above. Here it is significant. The hatred of the world was an abiding attitude, always liable to provoke unchristian retaliation, and always a temptation to the more "intelligent" to neglect their duty to their weaker brethren.
it is called out in active love and fellowship. Cf. Augustine (Tract. v. 10), "Nemo interroget hominem; redate unusquisque ad cordem suum: si ibi inuenerit charitatem fraternal, securus sit quia transit a morte ad uitam."

ὁ μὴ ἀγαπῶν] The statement is put in its most general form. The state in which love has not been called out into conscious activity is a state of death. Life is the chance of learning how love not only "might be," but "is."

The addition of τὸν ἀδελφόν in the Receptus is natural in the light of the preceding clause and of ver. 16. But it narrows down the writer's meaning unnecessarily. In his more absolute statements he shows himself fully aware that the duty of love is absolute, and has a wider application than the Christian Society, even as the Christ is the propitiation for the whole world, though in a practical Epistle he lays most stress on what is first practicable.

τους ἀδελφους] Cf. Aug. (Tract. v. 10). "Non movet manus ad occidendum hominem, homicida iam tenetur a Domino; uiuit ille, et iste iam interfector iudicatur." Hatred is the moving cause, whether or not the occasion for its final display has presented itself and been used. Cf. Mt. v. 23, 24.

ἀνθρωποκτόνος] Cf. Jn. viii. 44, the only other instance of its use in the N.T. It is, of course, used here in its literal sense of actual murderer, not of the murderer of the soul.

οἴδατε] It is axiomatic. Their natural consciousness as men will tell them that the higher life cannot be communicated as a permanent possession to such an one. The writer does not avoid the use of irony when it suits his purpose.

μένουσαν] Cf. Jn. i. 32, 33, v. 38, vi. 27; I Jn. ii. 14, 24; 2 Jn. 2. The word suggests that eternal life is both "a continuous power and a communicated life." Wohlenberg's attempt to connect the word μένουσαν with the following verse (Μένουσαν ἐν τούτῳ ἐγνώκαμεν τὴν ἀγάπην) is ingenious rather than convincing. Though it is not absolutely necessary to the sense, its position is justified by the μένει of ver. 14, and it serves to heighten the impossibility of the rejected hypothesis.

πᾶς . . . οὗ] The usual "Hebraistic" expression, or at least the form of expression which a Jew writing Greek would naturally adopt. Cf. 1 Jn. ii. 19, 21, etc.; and see Moulton's note, Grammar of New Testament Greek, vol. i. p. 245 f. Such phrases as χωρίς πάσης ἐπιθέσεως show that "vernacular usage" only needed to be extended “under the encouragement of a similar idiom in Hebrew.” But so far as the evidence goes it would seem that there has been “extension” in the Semitic direction. The construction is not found in the Gospel.

16-18. Description of true love, and exhortation to its practice. The essence of love was manifested once for all, finally and completely, when the Christ gave His life for men. We know what true love really is in the light of that example. And we cannot but recognize our obligation to follow it, if need be even to the last sacrifice, for our brethren. There is, however, a simple test by which we can know at once whether we are at least on the road which leads to the possession of true love. He who is unwilling to give of his external possessions, where need is obvious and well known to him, has not even begun to cherish true love for God in his soul. True love proves itself in action. It cannot stop short at expressions of which the tongue is the instrument. It must show by actual deeds that the words in which it is professed correspond to real feelings of the heart.

16. ἐν τούτῳ] The reference is to what follows, according to the writer's usual custom, especially when a clause with ὅτι follows.

τὴν ἀγάπην] Absolute. There is no need to supply a genitive, τοῦ Χριστοῦ or τοῦ θεοῦ. The true nature of love was manifested in such a way that men could learn to realize it, with abiding effects on their character and life (ἐγνώκαμεν).

ἐκεῖνος] He: neither writer nor readers feel the need for further definition by the addition of a name. Cf. the notes on VV. 2, 4:

ἐκεῖνος ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν] He for us: the Christ, the Son of God, for such as we are. The contrast is heightened by the order of the words. There are no depths of sacrifice to which true love will not stoop.

Neither of the O.T. phrases, which are usually quoted, afford a sufficiently close parallel to suggest an interpretation. The additions, of תְּשָׁנָה in the one case, and שִׁישָׁן in the other, determine the exact sense of שִׁישָן. The Rabbinic phrases quoted by Schlatter (on Jn. x. 11) all have שִׁישָן. The usage of the Fourth Gospel is a safer guide. Cf. Jn. x. 11, 15, 17, 18, xiii. 37-38, xv. 13; and also xiii. 4, τίθησι τὰ ἰμάτια. The latter passage suggests the idea of laying aside, as a garment is put off, which agrees well with the use of the phrase in Jn. x. 18. The usage of τιθέναι in Jn. ii. 10, τὸν καλὸν οἶνον τίθησιν, can hardly help us to determine its meaning here. The phrase does not occur again in the Johannine Books. The Latin translation "dat" in Jn. x. 11 is, of course, derived from the Western variant ἔδωσεν (N D). Elsewhere the Vulgate uses ponere.

Spitta's suggestions (ZNTW x. [1909] p. 78), that the phrase is used rightly in vv. 11, 15, in the sense of risking or staking his life for the sheep, and taken up in a different sense (of giving, or laying down) in the later interpolation of vv. 17, 18, is worthy of consideration, but it has perhaps been influenced by the Hebrew phrase, where the meaning, as has been pointed out, is determined by the added τὸν θάνατον. If the distinction is to be maintained, the present verse agrees with the "later" passage.

καὶ ἡμεῖς κ.τ.λ.] It is not clear whether this clause is added to the first clause, ἐκεῖνος . . . ἐθήκεν, and governed by ὅτι, or is to be regarded as a consequence of the example set by the Christ. The obligation, which all good men recognize, to sacrifice their lives, if need be, for others, may be part of the means whereby we learn what true love is. Such a κοινὴ ἐννοία of good men throws the clearest light on the nature of love. But the obligation, as felt by "us," may also be regarded as the consequence of what Christ has done. When once the perfect example has been set, the duty of all disciples to follow it is clear. Grammatically the first is preferable. But the use of καὶ in this Epistle is wide. The writer always thinks as a Hebrew, and this is reflected in his forms of expression. The second interpretation is therefore grammatically admissible. And it has the advantage of far greater simplicity and directness. The emphatic ἡμεῖς, moreover, is in favour of it.

εγνώκαμεν} εγνωκεν F ε 551 (216): γνωσκομεν F 114 (335).

τὴν ἀγάπην] του θεου 75 105 vg. (am. demid. harl.) arm-codd. boh-codd.: +ἰσις m tol. Vig.: +εις, Ambrst.

ημων] νυμων F 172 502 (319) 16 326 76 2307. 2806 (69).

ὑπερ των αδελφων] post ψυχας F 4587 (209) 16 5207 (241) F 551 (216).

K 5500 (922).

autou 31*.

ὑπερ] περι P.

των αδελφων] αλληλων boh. F 114 (335): +ημων F 101.7 (40).

17. The practical test. Wider obligations may be acknowledged with all readiness in theory, where a more homely test reveals the extent of a man's failure. The writer is always enforcing the truth that philanthropy begins at home. Cf. Philo,
III. 17, 18.] NOTES ON I JOHN

De Post. Cuin, 86 (Cohn, ii. 18), τι γὰρ ὄφελος λέγειν μὲν τὰ βέλτιστα, διανοεῖσθαι δὲ καὶ πράττειν τὰ αἰσχυστα; σοφιστῶν οὕτος ὁ τρόπος.

τὸν βίον τοῦ κόσμου] Well paraphrased in Augustine’s version, facultates mundi. Bios always denotes life in its external aspects. Cf. ii. 16, ἡ ἀλαζονία τοῦ βιοῦ: Mk. xii. 44 (=Lk. xxi. 4); 1 Ti. ii. 2; 2 Ti. ii. 4; and for the verb, 1 P. iv. 2, τὸν ἐπιλαυτοῦν ἐν σαρκὶ βιώσαι χρόνον. Cf. also Ac. xxvi. 4, τὴν . . . βίωσίν μου ἐκ νεότητος. Consequently, βίος is rare in the N.T., while ζωή occurs more than a hundred times.

θεωρῇ] Behold: not merely cast a passing glance, but see, long enough to appreciate and understand the circumstances of the case. Cf. Jn. xx. 6; Ac. iv. 13; Apos. xi. 1 f.

χρείαν ἔχοντα] Cf. ii. 27; and for the use of the phrase absolutely, Mk. ii. 25; Ac. ii. 45, iv. 35; Eph. iv. 28.

κλείσῃ] Cf. Ps. lxxvi. (lxxvii.) 10, ή συνέξει τῶν οἰκτειρμῶν αὐτῶν ἐν τῇ ὀργῇ . . . συν ἄποστέρεσι τὴν καρδίαν σου. The word perhaps suggests that a barrier has to be raised against the natural human feelings which the contemplation of such a case calls out.

τὰ σπλάγχνα] Cf. Pr. xii. το, τὰ δὲ σπλάγχνα τῶν ἀσεβῶν ἀνελεήμονα. The word is not found in the earlier parts of the Septuagint, and only in this passage is it used to translate מִן, which in the Psalms is paraphrased by οἰκτειρμοὶ (Ps. xxiv. [xxv.] 6, and in Isaiah (xlvii. 6) by ἔλεος. See Lightfoot’s note on Ph. i. 8. The classical distinction between σπλάγχνα and ἔντερα (not in N.T.) is not to be found in Hebrew forms of expression.

τοῦ θεοῦ] The context determines that the genitive must be objective. Cf. v. 3.

18. τεκνία] The appeal is made, as usual, on the ground of the common spiritual nature which they all share.

ἐν ἔργῳ καὶ ἀληθείᾳ] The phrase is contrasted with λόγῳ and γλώσσῃ. Practical love corresponds to inward truth. Much protestation is a mere exercise of the tongue.
19f. The consciousness that their love for God is true and active, assures men of their fellowship with God, that they are "of the truth." The choice of phrase is determined by the language of ver. 18. Practically it is equivalent to εἶναι ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ. And the consciousness of this fellowship brings assurance, in spite of what the conscience has to tell of thoughts and deeds which mar its realization. Even before God, in whose presence no falsehood can stand, the Christian can "still" his heart: for the all-knowing God is greater than the accusing conscience. Knowing all, He knows that the love is true, and is the determining element of the character, notwithstanding the many failures which interrupt its complete realization. His knowledge is absolute. He can see the whole, and He has accepted the love which is real and active as sufficient ground for admitting the man to His fellowship. Cf. Jn. xxi. 17, πάντα σὺ οἶδας, σὺ γινώσκεις ὅτι φιλῶ σε. The accusations of conscience are stilled in the presence of omniscient holiness, which is perfect love.

At first sight the omniscience of God may seem a strange ground for the confidence of men, who are conscious of sins that interrupt their fellowship with God. "If as natural men we shrink from allowing our neighbours to see into our heart, much more are we terrified at the thought that the holy God penetrates to the depth of our hearts" (Rothe). But in the case of Christians, who are conscious of the relationship to God in which they stand, it is otherwise. Their security lies in the fact that this relationship has been established by one who knows all the circumstances of the case. There is no fear of alteration in the light of fuller knowledge.

But how can such confidence be said to be derived from the practice of love, in the sphere in which it is first possible, i.e. in love of the brethren? The answer is that in such activities they have learned to know of a love, other than that based on physical kinship, which is not merely the "cloak of self-seeking"; and the more clearly its true character is recognized, the more clearly it is seen that such love is of the very Being of God. So the all-knowing "were the all-loving too." The surest ground of our confidence is the knowledge that "our help standeth in the name of the Lord," who is love.

Thus the general meaning of these verses is fairly plain. They have always been recognized as touching the very heart of the Christian faith. The exact interpretation, however, of each clause is a matter of considerable difficulty. The meaning of πείσομεν is disputed, as also of the first and second ὅτι. The difficulties caused by the sequence of two clauses introduced by ὅτι have led to the removal of the second ὅτι from some texts.

(1) If πείσομεν is taken in its usual sense of “persuade,” (a) the fact of which we “persuade our heart” may be left unstated, to be gathered from the context. If so, we must supply “that we are of the truth” from the preceding verse. This is grammatically unobjectionable, and gives an adequate sense. Even though our heart (conscience) convicts us of sins which separate us from God, we can nevertheless persuade ourselves that we are really of the truth, because God is greater than our hearts, in knowledge and in love, and has recognized our position, in spite of, or perhaps we should say in consequence of, the fact that He knows all, and so is qualified to judge. (β) The fact may be found in the second clause, “that God is greater than our heart.” Against this the objection is hardly valid that the fact is too obvious to be disputed. The question is not of the objective truth of the fact, but of our subjective apprehension of it, under circumstances which make its realization peculiarly difficult (ἐὰν καταγινώσκῃ «.7.A.). On the other hand, Dr. Westcott’s objection would seem to hold good, that “the consciousness of a sincere love of the brethren does not furnish the basis of the conviction of the sovereign greatness of God.” (γ) If the first suggestion (a) is felt to be unsatisfactory, there is some authority for the absolute use of πείθειν in the sense of “still,” assure, appease, tranquillize. Cf. Mt. xxviii. 14, καὶ ἐὰν ἀκουσθῇ τοῦτο ἐπὶ τοῦ ἡγεμόνος, ἡμεῖς πείσομεν καὶ ὑμᾶς ἀμερίμνους ποιήσομεν (where, however, the reference may be to the contents of ver. 13, the asserted theft of the body by the disciples); 2 Mac. iv. 45, ἐπηγγείλατο χρήματα . . . πρὸς τὸ πεῖσαι τὸν βασιλέα. We can appease our heart, can still the qualms of conscience, with the knowledge that God who knows all has admitted us to His fellowship and love, a fact of which we are assured by the active love for others which His love has kindled in our hearts. This is perhaps the simplest interpretation, though as an explanation of πείσομεν it is less natural than (a).

(2) The exact meaning of ὅτι in each clause and their mutual relations are of less moment. The meanings “that” or “because” have to some extent come under consideration in connection with πείθειν. But the relation of the first clause to the second is doubtful. (a) The second ὅτι may be regarded as resumptive, either in the sense of “that,” or “because.” The resumptive is more natural in the former than in the latter case. It is possible in either case. But the use of the resumptive ὅτι after so short a clause is not really natural, and is not in accord with the style of the writer. (β) The first ὅτε may be relative, "Whereinsoever our heart condemns us," the second ὅτι being taken in the sense of either "that" or "because." This interpretation relieves the sentence of an awkward and unnecessary resumptive particle, and it may be paralleled by instances of the use of ὅ τι αὐ in the Gospel, which are not indeed identical, but are sufficiently similar to justify its adoption here. Cf. Jn. ii. 5, xiv. 13, xv. 16. If we take into consideration the author's habit of throwing forward for the sake of emphasis a word or words which stand outside the general construction of his sentence, we may feel justified in assuming that he has here made use of an accusativial clause (of respect) in rather loose connection with the rest of the verse. For the use of ὅ τι αὐ (ἐὰν), cf. Mk. vi. 23; Lk. x. 35.

In what has been said, it has, of course, been assumed that the omniscience of God is alleged as a ground for confidence not for fear (if our own heart condemn us, the judgment of omniscient justice must be far more severe). The opposite view has been stoutly maintained by Wohlenberg in the series of articles referred to above (Neue Kirchliche Zeitschrift, 1902, p. 636 ff.), and also by Findlay (Expositor, November, 1905). Cf. also the comment of the Catena (Cramer, viii. 128), ἐὰν, φησίν, ἁμάρτωμεν οὐ λανθάνομεν, οὐδὲ διαφευγόμεθα: εἰ γὰρ ἀμαρτάνομεν τὴν καρδίαν ἑαυτῶν λαθεῖν; ώς ῥητήρ, μᾶλλον τὸν θεὸν πράττοντες τι τῶν φαύλων; οὐ δυνηθῶμεν λαθεῖν ; ἀλλὰ νυντίζομεν ὑπὸ τοῦ συνειδότος, πόσω μᾶλλον τὸν θεὸν πράττοντες τι τῶν φαύλων; ἐάν (ἐὰν) δυνηθῶμεν λαθεῖν ;

It makes the connection between vv. 19 and 20 almost impossible to explain. It can only be done by interposing a thought which is left altogether without expression in the passage. "We shall assure our heart—and we shall have great need to do so; for if our conscience condemn us, how much more severe must necessarily be the verdict of the omniscient God!" If this is what the writer meant, he has severely taxed the powers of his readers to follow his argument. And the aim of the whole passage is surely to give assurance, and not to strike terror into their hearts. There is nothing in the passage to indicate that vv. 20 and 21 are intended to meet the circumstances of two different classes of people, the self-confident and the self-distrustful.

In the explanation given of this passage it has been assumed that ἐν τούτῳ refers back to the previous verse, which is contrary to the common usage of the writer, though perhaps not unparalleled. It is, however, possible to find the test of knowledge, and consequent assurance, in the sentence ὅτι μείζων—πάντα. The thought of God's power and omniscience may give us assurance that we are "of the truth." We have been accepted... by one who knows all the circumstances. In view of the writer's usage there is much to be said for this interpretation. The general meaning of the passage is not affected by it. Windisch is inclined to regard the passage as corrupt, and suggests that we should read οὐ πείσομεν, and cut out the clause ὅτι εἶναι... καρδία as an interpolation based on ver. 21. Thus amended, the passage would certainly contain a warning to the self-confident, against which no exception could be taken. But the best criticism on the suggestion is his own next sentence, "Das beste ist freilich man bleibt bei der Konstatierung: der Text ist verderbt." The writer knows how to use the irony of the commonplace, but he did not use it here.

21 ff. If our conscience acquits us, the result is a feeling of joyful confidence in the sight of God, and the consciousness that our prayers are answered, because of our obedience and willing service.

ἀγαπητοί] Cf. ii. 7, iii. 2, one of the writer's favourite forms of address, and frequent in this second part of the Epistle, in which the main topic is love (iv. 1, 7, 11).

ἐὰν κινη.] The clause is most naturally interpreted in its widest sense, regarded neither as an antithesis to ver. 20 nor as a continuation of it. It includes all cases in which the verdict of the conscience is favourable, both those in which there has been no condemnation, and those in which assurance has been gained in spite of the condemnation of the heart, from the thought of the greatness and omniscience of God.

ἡ καρδία μὴ καταγινώσκῃ] Contrast the order of ver. 20. The stress is here laid on the faculty which passes judgment. The writer follows his usual custom of stating a principle absolutely, without considering the modifications which become necessary when it is applied to the individual case. In so far as the conscience passes a verdict of acquittal, the results stated necessarily follow. And the statement is made in the most absolute form, "if the heart do not condemn," though ἡμῶν has naturally been supplied in many texts, after καρδια and again after καταγινώσκῃ. The reading of B (ἔχει for ἔχομεν), which makes the heart the subject of the apodosis as well as of the protasis, is interesting. The form of ver. 20, however, makes it improbable that this is the original text.

παρρησίαν] Cf. ver. 14 and note. Boldness and confidence are the ideas which the word generally suggests, while here that of freedom of intercourse in "speaking with God" in prayer is prominent. The phrase denotes, of course, the boldness and freedom from restraint with which the children can approach their Father always, rather than the clear conscience and confidence with which they can await the verdict of the Judge on the Last Day.

22. The second result of the favourable verdict. All requests are granted which can be put forward in the freedom of intercourse which has been described. For the conditions which make it possible are obedience to the Divine commands, and willing and active serving in doing whatever is known to be according to His will. Every true prayer is the expression of the desire to obey and to do the will in those matters with which the request is concerned. We may compare the noble Jewish saying, "Do His Will as if it were thine, that He may do thy will as if it were His."

The two clauses express the two duties of obedience and willing service. True obedience to the Will of God must become spontaneous before it is made perfect.

τὰ ἀρεστὰ] The particular things which are pleasing in His sight, in the circumstances with reference to which the prayer is offered. Cf. Jn. viii. 29, ὅτι ἐγὼ τὰ ἀρεστὰ αὐτῶν ποιῶ πάντως, the only other instance of the use of τὰ ἀρεστὰ in the New Testament (ἀρεστῶν, Ac. xii. 3, vi. 2). Cf. the Pauline εὐάρεστος, Eph. v. 10, δοκιμάζοντες τί ἐστιν εὐάρεστον
Notes on I John 3

III. 22-24. Transition to the other command (of right belief), the fulfilment of which is also a sign that our religious standing is right. These two verses are clearly transitional, and serve to emphasize what is essential in the matter of obedience to His commands, and so to lead the way to the second statement of the Christological thesis, the necessity of a true confession and right belief. The commandments are summed up in the One Command, of belief and love. The following of the Christ, shown most clearly and characteristically in active love of men, is the essential condition of fellowship. And this fellowship is mutual. We abide in Him. He abides in us. The human side and the Divine are both essential parts of the Christian standing. Real fellowship issues in obedience. He who abides in Him keeps His commandments, not as a series of literal precepts, but as a life-giving principle (τηρεῖν, as contrasted with φυλάσσειν). And we are assured of the reality of the fellowship by the presence of the Spirit which He has given us. In these transitional verses three new points are introduced: (1) The mention of πιστεύειν, here for the first time used in the Epistle. (2) The emphasis on the Divine side of the fellowship, αὐτὸς ἐν ἡμῖν. (3) The mention of the Spirit.

(1) The introduction of the idea of “believing” is as abrupt here as it is in the partly parallel passage in the Gospel, vi. 29, τοῦτό ἐστι τὸ ἐργον τοῦ θεοῦ ἵνα πιστεύῃς εἰς ὅν ἀπέστειλεν ἐκεῖνος, where the emphasis is on personal trust and devotion (πιστεύειν εἰς), rather than on conviction as to the truth of certain facts about the object of τιστεύειν (πιστ. c. dat.). The reason of this difference of stress is clear. Thus far in the Epistle, emphasis has been laid on the necessity of obedience to the commands of the Christ, especially to the law of love. The following of the Christ has been shown to be the necessary expression of Christian life, without which it is a "lie" to claim that the life is that of a Christian. But He must be followed because of what He is. Conviction, therefore, as to what He is must necessarily precede obedience to what He commands. No other peasant of Galilee has the right to command the allegiance of men. The writer is anxious to remind his readers of this, since the preceding meditations, which deal rather with practical issues, might tend to obscure its importance.

(2) The transitional verses, which helped to introduce the section of the Epistle here brought to its close, emphasized the human side of the fellowship of Christians with God (ii. 28, μένετε ἐν αὐτῷ). But the Divine side is essential, and on this the writer proceeds to lay stress in the following chapter. In the second part of ver. 24 this is made clear, γινώσκομεν ὅτι μένει ἐν ἡμῖν. "Fellowship with God, and consciousness of it, rest upon the acknowledgment and appropriation of a divine act and of the divine nature of love" (Haupt).

(3) Christians are conscious that God "abides in them" because they are conscious of the presence of the Spirit which God has given them. The repetition of this statement in iv. 13 shows that the words must be taken in this sense here. The thought is developed in the next section of the Epistle. God has really given His Spirit to men, though all spiritual influences to which men feel themselves to be subject are not the work of God's Spirit. Men must distinguish between the true and the false.

28. αὕτη] points forward according to the writer's usual custom. Cf. note on i. 5.

ἵνα πιστεύωμεν] The ἵνα is definitive, as elsewhere in the Epistles and Gospel where it is preceded by αὕτη. The aorist is probably the true text. As contrasted with the present πιστεύωμεν, which was not unnaturally substituted for it, it lays stress, not on the initial act of faith (this is only one of the uses of the aorist, and not the most frequent), but on the whole process conceived as an unity. The conviction is regarded as one fact, not as a continuous process continuously exercising its influence on men. The aorist emphasizes the single fact, without in any way suggesting the length of time occupied in its manifestation. It can quite naturally sum up the action, or actions, of a period or of a lifetime, which it regards as "one act at once."

tῷ ὀνόματι] The construction (c. dat.) expresses conviction of the truth of a statement rather than devotion to a person (eis
The expression, therefore, denotes conviction that Christ really is that which His name implies Him to be. It would, of course, be a serious misstatement of the facts to state that this is all, or the chief part, of what the writer means by πιστεύειν. Cf. Scott, The Fourth Gospel, p. 267, “It is evident, even to a superficial reader, that the ‘believing’ so constantly insisted on by John is something much narrower and poorer than the Pauline ‘faith.’ It implies not so much an inward disposition of trust and obedience, as the acceptance of a given dogma. To ‘believe’ is to grant the hypothesis that Jesus was indeed the Christ, the Son of God,”—a very misleading statement, somewhat modified, however, by the succeeding paragraphs. But by using this particular construction (c. dat.) the writer does in certain cases emphasize this particular meaning. When he defines the “work of God” in Jn. vi. 29, he is careful to use a different expression (ίνα πιστεύητε εἰς δν ἀπέστειλεν).

tοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ] “A compressed creed,” the complete revelation of the Father, the man who lived on earth a true human life, the promised Messiah who fulfilled the expectations of Jews and of all men. Cf. Jn. xx. 31. All His commands are summed up in the one command to love, obedience to which must begin with those closest to hand.

καὶ ἀγαπῶμεν] The new command was to love according to a new standard, καθὼς ἠγάπησα ὑμᾶς, Jn. xvii. 34. The references to the discourses of the Upper Chamber are very obvious throughout these verses.

καὶ τηρον] Cf. Jn. xiv. etc., and the latter part of xvii. The chief point in dispute in this verse is the reference of the pronouns. At first sight the reference to Christ’s command in ver. 23 would suggest that in this verse αὐτοῦ, etc., must be referred to Christ. But in ver. 22 the ἐντολαί are spoken of as God’s commands, and the αὐτοῦ of ver. 23 must refer to God (τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ). It is therefore more natural to interpret them in the same way in this verse. Cf. iv. 13, where the reference must be to God. It is true that in the Last Discourses ρέων is generally connected with Christ, but cf. xvii. 21, ἵνα αὐτοὶ ἐν ημῖν ὄσην. It is in Christ that fellowship with God is realized.

τηρεῖν] Cf. the note on ii. 4.

αὐτὸς ἐν αὐτῷ] See the note above (2). The divine side of the relation is brought out in ch. iv.

ἐν τούτῳ] Either (1) ἐν τῷ τηρεῖν τὰς ἐντολὰς αὐτοῦ, in the fact of our obedience to His commands we realize His fellowship with us, or (2) ἐκ τοῦ πνεύματος, the gift of the Spirit, of which we are conscious, assures us of the fact of fellowship. The repetition of the verse, in a slightly altered form, in iv. 13 makes it almost necessary to interpret the phrase thus.

οὗ] An ordinary instance of attraction. The genitive is not partitive. With the partitive genitive S. John commonly has ἐκ: 2 Jn. 4; 1 Jn. i. 24, vii. 40, etc.

ἔδωκεν] emphasizes the fact. In iv. 13 the permanent effects of the gift are brought into prominence.

II. iv. 1-6. The Christological thesis. The Spirit which is of God recognizes Jesus as the Christ come in flesh.

iv. 1-8. In accordance with his usual custom, the writer finds a transition to a new section in the repetition of the last prominent idea. The gift of the Spirit ensures to them knowledge. But all spiritual activities of the time could not be traced back to the Spirit of God as their source. The suggestions of every spirit could not be accepted as true. As at Corinth in the days of S. Paul, spiritual phenomena must be tested. And the reader's experience supplied them with a test by which they could know whether the spirits were of God or not. The surest criterion was the confession of the Incarnation, or rather of the Incarnate Christ. Those who saw in Jesus of Nazareth as He appeared on earth in fleshly form the complete revelation of the Father, were of God. Those who refused to confess Jesus were not of God. Such a refusal was the peculiar characteristic of Antichrist, whose coming they had been taught to expect, and whose working they could already perceive.

1. ἀγαπητοί] Cf. ii. 7, etc. The writer appeals to the common bond of love which unites them all, in order to call out their best efforts for the common good. This address now becomes frequent (I, 7, 11), the main topic being love.

\[\text{μὴ παντὶ πνεύματι πιστεύετε}\] Cf. Didache, xi. 8, oυ πᾶς δὲ ὁ λαλῶν ἐν πνεύματι προφήτης ἐστίν, ἀλλὰ εἰς τοὺς τρόπους Κυρίου. ἀπὸ οὐν τῶν τρόπων γνωσθῆσεται ὁ ψευδοπροφήτης καὶ ὁ προφήτης. All spirit-inspired utterances are not to be accepted as necessarily true.

\[\text{πιστεύειν τω ἄνα τοις πεπιστευκότας αὐτῶ 'Ιουδαίους.}\]

\[\text{ἀλλὰ δοκιμάζετε}\] Cf. 1 Co. xii. τὸ, ἄλλῳ δὲ διακρίσεις πνευμάτων, where the “discerning of spirits” is one of the recognized kinds of χαρίσματα. In the earlier generations the spiritual phenomena which accompanied the growth of Christianity were a cause of grave anxiety to all Christian leaders. It needed a special grace to distinguish between the true and the false. They might be delusions or impostures; if real, they might be evil. Cf. τ Th. v. 19-21, τὸ πνεῦμα μὴ σβέννυτε προφητείας μὴ ἐξουθενεῖτε πάντα δὲ δοκιμάζετε. It would generally have been far easier to say, with the ἰδιώτης of Corinth, μαίνεσθε. The difficulty, which culminated in Montanism, is of periodic recurrence. But the writer reminds his hearers that the grace of discernment was part of the Christian endowment, if Christians were willing to use the χάρισμα which they possessed. Compare the passage quoted above from the Didache; and, for the danger of yielding to the opposite temptation, compare the preceding sentences (xi. 7), καὶ πάντα προφήτην λαλοῦντα ἐν πνεύματι οὐ πειράσετε οὐδὲ διακρινεῖτε πᾶσα γὰρ ἁμαρτία ἀφεθήσεται, αὕτη δὲ ἡ ἁμαρτία οὐκ ἀφεθήσεται. Compare also xii. 1, πᾶς δὲ ὁ ἐρχόμενος ἐν ὀνόματι Κυρίου δεχθήτω: ἔπειτα δὲ δοκιμάσαντες αὐτὸν γνώσεσθε" σύνεσιν γὰρ ἐξετε δεξιὰν καὶ ἀριστεράν. The plurals here cannot refer to an individual official.

\[\text{ὅτι πολλοὶ κ.τ.λ.}\] The clause explains the necessity for the testing. The spirit of evil has sent forth his messengers into the world, and their activity is well known.

\[\text{ψευδοπροφήται}\] Cf. Mt. vii. 15, προσέχετε ἀπὸ τῶν ψευδο\[\text{προφητῶν.}\]

\[\text{Did. xi. 6.}\]

\[\text{ἐξεληλύθασιν}\] Contrast the tense of ii. 19, where the definite fact of their separation from the Body of the Faithful is stated. Here the thought is of their sending forth by the Spirit who inspires them, and of the effect of their mission in the world. Here ὁ κόσμος is used in its natural sense of the world of men, and is not specially contrasted with the Christian Body.
2. ὑπὸ τῶν τῶν] refers to what follows, according to the customary usage of this Epistle.

γινώσκεται] The word may be taken either as imperative or indicative. At first sight the use of the imperative in ver. 1 would seem conclusive as to the interpretation of this verse. But an appeal to his readers' knowledge and experience is more in accordance with the writer's method. The aim of the whole Epistle is to remind them of what they already possess, and to base on it an appeal to them to make use of that which they have. In the Christian faith, as it has been taught to them from the beginning, they have adequate provision against the dangers to which they now find themselves exposed. All that is needed is that they should use what they already possess. They must trust the powers with which the Christ has endowed them. Cf. ii. 29. Nowhere in the Epistle does the imperative follow ἐν τούτῳ: ii. 3, 5, iii. 16, 19, 24, iv. 13, v. 2.

The reading γινώσκεται, which has passed into the Vulgate (cognoscitur), is an obvious corruption, the interchange of αι and ε being perhaps the commonest itacism in Greek manuscripts. The direct appeal to his readers is far more congruous with the author's style, and suits the context better.

τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ θεοῦ] Here only in the Johannine books. Cf. ver. 13, ἐκ τοῦ πνεύματος αὐτοῦ. The vacillation between singular and plural, and the various genitives connected with πνεῦμα, may perhaps serve as indications that the doctrine of the Spirit is not yet clearly defined in precise terms.

ὁμολογεῖ] The verb is used in the Johannine books with the following constructions: (1) absolutely, cf. Jn. i. 20, xii. 42; (2) with δι', cf. 1 Jn. iv. 15; (3) with the single accusative, cf. 1 Jn. i. 9 (τὰς ἁμαρτίας), ii. 23 (τὸν υἱόν), iv. 3 (Ἰησοῦν); (4) with the double accusative, cf. Jn. ix. 22, ἐάν τις αὐτὸν ὁμολογήσῃ Χριστόν. The construction of 2 Jn. 7, μὴ ὁμολογοῦντες Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐρχόμενον ἐν σαρκί, is parallel to this verse, and equally obscure. Three constructions are possible here. (1) Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν may be the object and ἐληλυθότα ἐν σαρκί the predicate. The confession of Jesus Christ as one who has come in the flesh is the test proposed. We may perhaps compare S. Paul's test in 1 Co. xii. 3, οὐδεὶς δύναται εἶπεῖν Κύριος Ἰησοῦς εἶ μὴ ἐν πνεύματι ἅγιο. In favour of this construction is the natural connection which it gives of Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν, which can hardly be separated unless the context clearly suggests their separation. (2) The form of ver. 3, according to the true text, is in favour of regarding Ἰησοῦν as object and the rest of the words as predicate. The error which the writer condemns seems to have been the rejection of the identity of the historical man Jesus with the pre-existent Christ, truly incarnate in His manhood, in favour of the view that some higher power, as the Aeon Christ, descended upon the man Jesus at the Baptism, and left him before the Passion. There is nothing in the Epistle which compels us to suppose that the author is combating pure Docetism, though, of course, such teaching would be excluded by the phrases used in these verses, in whatever way they are interpreted. The construction of Jn. ix. 22 may perhaps be urged as supporting this interpretation. And it probably emphasizes most clearly the view on which the writer wishes to lay stress. It is the denial of Jesus as the incarnate Christ which he regards as the source of all error, as the true text of ver. 3 (μὴ ὁμολογεῖ Ἰησοῦν) shows. But so far as grammar and syntax are concerned this separation of Ἰησοῦν from Χριστόν, without anything in the context to necessitate it, or even to suggest it, is difficult. (3) The simplest construction is, therefore, that in which the whole phrase is regarded as connected. The confession needed is of one who is Jesus Christ incarnate, a man who lived on earth a true human life under the normal conditions of humanity, and who is also the pre-existent Christ who manifested God’s glory in this form. And the true text of ver. 3 favours this construction, if it is not regarded as too awkward.

But whichever construction be adopted, the confession demanded is not of the truth of certain propositions about a certain person, but the confession of a Person, of whom certain propositions are true, who is possessed of the nature and qualities which they define. It is a confession not of the fact of the Incarnation, but of the Incarnate Christ.

ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα] The phrase describes the method rather than the fact. The revelation of God was made to men by the Son of God appearing in human form and living a human life. It was given in a form which made it comprehensible to men, and its effects were abiding (ἐληλυθότα). Its whole validity depended on the Revealer being true man, who could speak to men as one of themselves. The guarantee for its completeness and its intelligibility was destroyed if the Revealer and the man were not one and the same. And the confession involved allegiance to the Person of the Revealer; without that men could not make the revelation their own. Non sonando, sed amando (Bede).

The reading ἐληλυθέναι which is found in some important authorities is a natural correction of a difficult and somewhat awkward phrase. When Polycarp uses the passage he not unnaturally substitutes the infinitive for the participle. (Polycarp, ad Philipp. vi. 3 f., ἀπεχόμενοι τῶν σκανδάλων καὶ τῶν ψευδαδέλφων καὶ τῶν ψευδαδελφῶν καὶ τῶν ἐν ὑποκρίσει φερόντων τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ κυρίου, οἵτινες ἀποπλανῶσι κενοὺς ἀνθρώπους. Πὰς γὰρ ὃς ἂν μὴ ὁμολογῇ Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθέναι, ἀντίχριστός ἐστιν). But it misses the point. True confession is allegiance to a Person and not acceptance of a doctrinal statement. Only the spirits which inspire men to make such a confession are "of God."

3. The simple accusative τὸν Ἰησοῦν is undoubtedly the true text. The variants Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν, κύριον, ἐληλυθότα ἐν σαρκί are natural attempts to expand an abrupt phrase from the preceding verse. The interesting variant λύει which is presupposed in several Patristic passages must be discussed separately. It is not the only instance of an explanatory gloss which has influenced the text of this Epistle.

The shorter text emphasizes clearly the personal character of the confession (see the notes on the preceding verse). And it lays the right stress on the danger which threatened the readers of listening to those who undervalued the importance of the human life and personality of Jesus of Nazareth.

τοῦτο] The denial of Jesus.

τὸ τοῦ ἀντίχριστου] Either the Spirit which comes from Antichrist, or more probably the special characteristic of Antichrist. The work of Antichrist was already being done in the world.

οἱ ἀκηκόατε] Cf. 11. 18, ἠκούσατε ὅτι Ἀντίχριστος ἔρχεται. The "coming" of Antichrist formed part of common Jewish expectation and Christian teaching. The readers had been taught what to expect, and ought to find no difficulty in detecting its beginnings among them.

IV. 3.] NOTES ON I JOHN

τοῦ] καὶ 2ο 487 (=).
εἰ] om. Κ L καί et al. plus* cat.
τοῦτο—ο 2ο] hic est Antichristus quem sah. boh. arm.
το] om. 79 6203ff. 254 (205) Κ 64 (51) | τοῦ 2ο] om. 1ο 84 (233).

The evidence for the reading λύει = soluit in this verse is mainly Latin; before von der Goltz's discovery, described below, it was almost exclusively so. The statements of Clement, Origen, and Socrates are most naturally explained as proving the existence of such a reading in Greek. Taking the evidence roughly in chronological order, we must notice first that of Irenaeus, though it is unfortunately only preserved in a Latin dress. In iii. 16. 8 (Massuet, 207), Irenaeus is denouncing the Gnostics who distinguish between Jesus, the Christ, the Only-begotten, the Saviour. He accuses them of making many Gods, and Fathers many, and of dividing up the Son of God. The Lord warns us to beware of such, and John, His disciple, in his afore-mentioned Epistle says, "Multi seductores exierunt in hunc mundum qui non confitentur Iesum Christum in carne uenisse. Hic est seductor et Antichristus. Videte eos, ne perdatis quod operati estis (2 Jn. 7, 8). Et rursus in epistola ait: Multi pseudoprophetae exierunt de saeculo. In hoc cognoscite spiritum Dei. Omnis spiritus qui confitetur Iesum Christum in carne uenisse, ex Deo est. Et omnis spiritus qui soluit Iesum, non est ex Deo, sed de Antichristo est." The actual reading, "qui soluit Iesum," may be due to the Latin translator; but it must be noticed that it suits the preceding words of Irenaeus, comminuens autem et per multa dividens Filium Dei, so much better than the common reading μὴ δομολογεῖ (non confitetur), that it is more natural to suppose that Irenaeus had in his Greek text either λύει or some equivalent phrase, unless his translator has very freely paraphrased the whole passage to bring it into agreement with the text of the Epistle with which he was acquainted. (See, however, Westcott, p. 157.)

The evidence of Clement of Alexandria was also available only through Latin sources. The Latin summary of his Hypotyposes has no equivalent for this passage; but in the summary of the Second Epistle we find, "Adstruit in hac epistola perfectionem fidei extra caritatem non esse, et ut nemo diuidat Iesum Christum, sed unum credat Iesum Christum uenisse in carne," words which do not go far towards proving that Clement knew of the reading λύει in Greek, but when taken in connection with two passages in Origen suggest the possibility that the reading was known at Alexandria in Clement’s time.

In the Latin version of Origen’s Commentary on S. Matthew, § 65, the reading “soluit Jesum” is found. The passage is an explanation of the parable, Mt. xxiv. 14. The man who went on a journey being naturally identified with the Lord, Origen raises the difficulty, “How can He be said to go on a journey who promised that where two or three are gathered together in His name, He will be in their midst?” He finds a solution of the difficulty which he has raised in the distinction between the Lord’s divine and human natures. “Secundum hanc divinitatis suae naturam non peregrinatur, sed peregrinatur secundum dispensationem corporis quod suscepit.” He adds other instances of statements which must be referred to His human nature, and then adds, “Haec autem dicentes non soluimus suscepti corporis hominem, cum sit scriptum apud Joannem ‘Omnis spiritus qui soluit Iesum non est ex Deo’ sed unicuique substantiae proprietatem seruamus.” The whole argument is so thoroughly in Origen’s style, that we should hesitate to attribute the quotation of the verse in this form to the Translator, though we cannot be certain that Origen read λύει in his Greek text. The passage has been quoted frequently, but it is curious that another passage in the part of his Commentary on S. Matthew which is extant in Greek has been generally overlooked. I had noted the passage several years ago, but have seen no reference to it earlier than Dr. Zahn’s Introduction. In xvi. 8, Origen is commenting on the words δοῦναι τῇ ψυχῇ αὐτοῦ λύτρον ἀντί πολλῶν. He notices that the ψυχῇ is given as the λύτρον, not the πνεῦμα nor the σῶμα. He adds the caution that in saying this he has no wish to disparage the ψυχῇ of Jesus, but wishes only to insist on the exact statement made. And he adds, Πλὴν σήμερον οὐ λύω τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἀπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ, ἀλλὰ πολλῶν πλέον οἶδα ἐν εἶναι Ἰησοῦν τὸν Χριστόν. The passage may only be an echo of such expressions as are found, e.g., in Irenaeus iii. xii. 7, “Qui autem Iesum separant a Christo.” But a comparison of these two passages in the same Commentary certainly leave the impression that the reading λύει was known to Origen. The matter is determined if the Scholion is correct which is found in the Athos MS, containing information about Origen’s text which von der Goltz has described in Texte und Untersuchungen, N. F. ii. 4. The Scholion, which is quoted on p. 48 of von der Goltz’s work, is as follows: ὃ λύει τὸν Ἰησοῦν. Οὕτως ὃ Εἰρηναῖος ἐν τῷ τρίτῳ κατὰ τὰς αἱρέσεις λόγω καὶ Ὡμιγενῆς ἐν τῷ η’ τόμῳ τῶν εἰς τὸν πρός Ρωμαίους ἐξηγητικῶν καὶ Κλήμης ὁ Στρωματεύς ἐν τῷ περὶ τοῦ πάσχα λόγῳ. Von der Goltz points out that the 8th Book of Origen's Commentary would seem to have contained his exposition of Ro. v. 17–vi. 16, and in Rufinus' translation (v. 8; Lomm. p. 356) 1 Jn. iv. 2 is quoted, so that it is not unlikely that in the original Greek the quotation included the third verse with the reading λύε. Thus, if we may trust the evidence of the Scholion, and there are no good grounds for not doing so, in the three instances where extant Latin evidence suggested that the reading was known to Greek writers, we have now definite evidence that it was found in their Greek text.

The only other Greek evidence for the reading is the well-known passage of Socrates about Nestorius (H. E. vii. 32), αὐτίκα γοῦν ἠγνόησεν ὅτι ἐν τῇ καθολικῇ Ἰωάννου γέγραπτο ἐν τοῖς παλαιοῖς ἀντιγράφοις ὅτι πᾶν πνεῦμα ὃ λύει τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ οὐκ ἔστι. τὰ τευτην γὰρ τῶν διάνοιαν ἐκ τῶν παλαιών ἀντιγράφων περιείλον οἱ χωρίζειν ἀπὸ τοῦ τῆς οἰκονομίας ἄνθρωπον βουλόμενοι τὴν θεότητα· οὗ καὶ οἱ παλαιοὶ ἑρμηνεῖς αὐτὸ τοῦτο ἐπεσημήναν, ὥς τινες εἶνερ ραδιοργήσαντες τὴν ἐπιστολὴν, λύειν ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ τὸν ἄνθρωπον θέλοντες. Again this language may be “satisfied by the supposition that he was acquainted with the Latin reading and some Latin commentary” (Westcott, p. 157). But this can hardly be called the most natural interpretation of his words.

The evidence of Tertullian and Augustine points to the early existence of the phrase in connection with the passages in the Johannine Epistles, though it is not always certain whether this passage or the similar words in the Second Epistle are referred to. The most important passage is adv. Marc. v. 16, “Johannes dicit processisse in mundum praecursoris Antichristi spiritus, negantes Christum in carne uenisse et soluentes Iesum.” Augustine in a somewhat different manner appears to comment on both readings. After explaining the words “qui non confitetur Iesum Christum in carne uenisse” by the suggestion that the denial is to be found in the want of love which divides the Church, he continues, “adeo ut noueritis quia ad facta retulit et omnis spiritus, ait, qui soluit Iesum.” Later on he has “soluis Iesum et negas in carne uenisse.” The natural explanation of his treatment of the passage is that in his text the words “qui soluit Iesum, non est ex Deo” (the addition of “in carne uenisse” after “Iesum” in Migne must be an error) followed the clause “qui non confitetur Iesum Christum in carne uenisse.” There are other instances of supplementary glosses in Augustine’s text of this Epistle. The quotation in the Testimonia of Cyprian (ii. 8), “Omnis spiritus qui confitetur Iesum Christum in carne uenisse, de Deo est, qui autem negat in carne uenisse, de Deo non est, sed est de Antichristi spiritu,” shows that the reading “soluit” was not found in the earliest form of the old Latin text, in spite of its presence in all Latin MSS except Codex Frisianus.
On the whole, then, the Latin evidence points to the probability that this reading crept into the Latin texts at an early date, being first introduced as an explanatory gloss, which subsequently displaced the reading it was inserted to explain. The history of its appearance in Greek authorities is still obscure, but may perhaps be explained in the same way.

And the internal evidence points in the same direction. It is far easier to explain ὃ λύει as an attempt to emphasize the bearing of the verse on the heretical views of the “Separators,” than vice versa. As Wurm has acutely observed, the reading ἃ ὧν ὁμολογεῖ, etc., could only have been introduced as an explanatory gloss on ὃ λύει at a time when the meaning of this phrase had been forgotten. But it is certainly found during the period when the reading “qui soluit” could cause no difficulty and was perfectly well understood. Neither reading can be later than Irenaeus, and at that date there could have been no motive for the alteration of λύει if it had been the original reading. On the other hand, the correction of ὧν ὁμολογεῖ into λύει would give special point to the passage as a condemnation of a particular form of heresy, which at that time had to be combated.

2. iv. 4-6. Attitude of the Church and the world towards this confession.

4-6. If they are true to themselves the readers have nothing to fear from the activities of the Antichristian spirits at work in the world. In virtue of the new birth, which as Christians they have experienced, they have gained the victory over the false prophets, and the fruits of the victory are theirs, unless they deliberately forfeit them. The victory was not gained in their own strength. It was God who fought for them and in them. And God is greater than the devil who rules in the world. The false prophets are essentially “of the world.” All that dominates their life and action comes from it. Their teaching is derived from its wisdom, not from the revelation which God has given in His Son. And so their message is welcomed by those who belong to the world. For like associates with like. The writer and his fellow-teachers are conscious that they derive their true life from God. And those who are of God, and therefore live their lives in learning to know Him better, in the gradual assimilation of the revelation of Himself which God is making in His Son, receive the message. It is only rejected by those who are not of God, and so are not learning to know Him. Thus from the character of those who welcome their respective messages we learn to recognize and distinguish the spirit of truth and the spirit of falsehood.

4. ὑμεῖς] The readers, whom he has instructed in the Faith, and whom he naturally addresses as his "little children," using the privileges of age and position when he wishes to speak emphatically, in words either of warning or of exhortation. Cf. ii. 1, 12, 28, iii. 7, 18, v. 21. The emphatic pronoun separates the readers from the false teachers.

ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστε] Cf. Jn. viii. 23, xvii. 14, 16; i Jn. iii. 19, v. 19, ii. 19. By the phrase εἶναι ἐκ the writer seems to denote more than merely "belonging to." It suggests primarily spiritual dependence. A man is said to be "of God," "of the Devil," who draws all his inspiration, all that dominates and regulates his thought and action, from the sources out of which he is said to be. Εἶναι ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ denotes especially the state of those who have experienced the spiritual regeneration which is the true note of the Christian, and who are true to their experience. Εἶναι ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου is the state of those who still, whether nominally Christian or not, draw their guidance from human society, considered as an ordered whole, apart from God.

υευκκήκατε] by remaining true to the Christianity which they had been taught ἀν’ ἀρχῆς, rather than by the expulsion of the false prophets (αὐτοὺς) from the community.

ὅτι] There was no cause for boasting of their victory. It was God who worked in them, as the Devil worked and ruled in the world. Noli te extollere. Vide quis in te vict (Aug.).

νειλισ] pr. καὶ Ἰα. 70 (505) : pr. ὅτι Ἰα. 167. 161 (312) | εἴαι, filii sah. ἐστε] nati estis sah. τεκνα] τεκνα 31 cscr. al. pauc. : om. boh-sah. νευκκήκατε] εὐκκήκατε Ια. 114 (335) | ἡμιν] ημιν Ἰα. 75 (394). | o 2ο. om. ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου εἰσίν] See the notes on ver. 4. The false teaching drew its strength from the wider knowledge of the world, rejecting or failing to appreciate the essential truth of the revelation made in Jesus Christ incarnate.

ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου λαλοῦσιν] Their teaching corresponds to their sphere. And it is welcomed by the like-minded.

ἀκουεί] Cf. Oecumenius, τῷ γὰρ ὁμοίῳ τὸ ὁμοίον προστρέχει. There was apparently need of encouragement in view of the success which the false teachers had secured. Cf. again Oecumenius, εἰκὸς γάρ τινας τῶν καὶ ἀσχάλλειν ὅρωντας ἐκείνους μὲν τῶς πολλοῖς περισσοποδάστους, ε авгους δὲ καταφρονοῦ-μένους.

6. ημεῖς] The contrast with υμεῖς (ver. 5) suggests that the teachers and not the whole body of Christians are meant. They know whence they draw the inspiration of their life and work. And they will be recognized by those who have begun to live the eternal life which consists in knowing God and His messenger (cf. Jn. xvii. 3).

δ τὸν θεον] The phrase is used as practically equivalent to εἰναι ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ, but it emphasizes one particular point in the continual progress made by those who “are of God,” viz. the knowledge of Him which comes from experience of life in fellowship with Him.

δ οὐκ ἔστιν κ.τ.λ.] They cannot know or welcome the truth, because the principles which guide their thoughts are not derived from the truth.

ἐκ τούτου] Cf. Jn. vi. 66, xix. 12, in neither of which verses is the meaning exclusively temporal. The phrase is not used again in the Epistle, or in the Johannine writings, with γινώσκειν. As compared with ἐν τούτῳ it may perhaps suggest a criterion which is less obvious, and which lies further away from that which it may be used to test. The character of their confession offers an immediate test of the spirits. It requires a longer process of intelligent observation to determine the character of the reception with which the message meets. The “test” here is the fact that the one message is welcomed by those who are of God and know God, the other only by those who are of the world. Cf. Jn. xv. 19.

γινώσκομεν] The preceding ἡμεῖς and ἡμῶν make it natural to refer this to the teachers, and grammatically this is no doubt the more correct interpretation. But when the writer is meditating, rather than pursuing a course of logically developed thought, his meditation is apt to pass out into wider spheres, and it is more than probable that he now includes in the first person plural the whole body of those whom he is addressing, as well as the teachers, with whom he began by associating himself.

tὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας κ.τ.λ.] The Spirit of God, of which the essential characteristic is truth, and the spirit of the Devil, or of Antichrist, which is characterized by falsehood, the active falsehood which leads men astray (πλάνης).

C. iv. 7–v. 12.
Third presentation of the ethical and Christological theses. They are not only shown to be connected (as in B), but the proof of their inseparability is given. Love is the basis of our knowledge of fellowship with God, because God is love. And this love of God is manifested in the sending of His Son, as faith comprehends it. So the two main thoughts of the Epistle, Faith in Jesus Christ and Love of the Brethren, are intertwined in this passage, which may be divided into two sections.

I. iv. 7-21. First meditation on the two thoughts now combined. Love based on faith in the revelation of Love which has been given, the test of our knowledge of God and of our birth from God.

II. v. 1-12. Faith as the ground of love.

I. 1. iv. 7-12. Love based on the Revelation of Love.

(a) 7-10. The writer grounds an appeal to his “beloved” hearers for mutual love on the true nature of love as manifested in the Incarnation. True love is not merely a quality of nature, and on that analogy included in our conception of the Deity. It has its origin in God. Human love is a reflection of something in the Divine nature itself. Its presence in men shows that they have experienced the new birth from God and share in that higher life which consists in gradually becoming acquainted with God. Where love is absent there has not been even the beginning of the knowledge of God, for love is the very nature and being of God. And God’s love has been manifested in us. God sent His only-begotten Son, in whom His whole nature is reproduced, who alone can fully reveal it to men, into the world of men with a special purpose. That purpose was to enable men to share the higher spiritual life which He imparts (ἵνα ζήσωμεν δὲ αὐτοῦ). The nature of true love is manifested in those who have begun to share that life. True love is something which gives itself, neither in return for what has been given nor in order to get as much again: even as God gave His Son, not as a reward for the love which men had showed to Him, but as a boon to those who had only manifested their hostility to Him, in order to remove the obstacles which intervened between God and men.

7. ἀγαπητοί] One of the writer’s favourite words. It occurs ten times in the Epistles, though not in the Gospel. It is his usual method of address when he wishes to appeal to the better thoughts and feelings of his readers, or, to use S. Paul’s phrase, to “open the eyes of their hearts.” It emphasizes the natural grounds of appeal for mutual love, which can most readily be called out among those who are loved or lovable.

ἡ ἀγάπη ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστίν] The whole of the Biblical revelation of God emphasizes the fact that man is made in the image of God, not God in the image of man, however much our conceptions of God are necessarily conditioned by human limitations. It suggests that whatever is best in man is the reflection, under the limitations of finite human existence, of something in the nature of God. The true nature of love cannot be appreciated unless it is recognized that its origin must be sought beyond human nature. We may compare the doctrine of "Fatherhood" insisted upon in Eph. iii. 15.

πᾶς ὁ ἀγαπῶν] It is generally recognized that love is here presented, not as the cause of the new birth from God or of the knowledge of God, but as their effect. The presence of love is the test by which the reality of their presence in any man may be known. The discussion of the question whether the writer intends to present the relation of the being born of God to the knowledge of God as one of cause and effect, or of effect and cause, is perhaps idle. He who loves shows thereby that he has experienced the new birth from God which is the beginning of Christian life, and that its effects are permanent and abiding. He also shows that he has entered upon that life which consists in the gradual acquiring of the knowledge of God. Whether this process of acquiring knowledge begins before, and leads to, the new birth, or only begins after that has been experienced and is its consequence, is not stated. The question was probably not present to the writer's mind.

8. The negative counterpart of ver. 7, the statement being made, as usual, with a slight difference.

οὐκ ἔγνω] He shows by his want of love that the process of knowledge never even began in him.

διὸ ὁ θεὸς ἀγάπη ἐστιν] Love is not merely an attribute of God, it is His very Nature and Being; or rather, the word expresses the highest conception which we can form of that Nature. Holtzmann's note is worth quoting. "Even the false gnosis realized that God is light and spirit. But when here and in ver. 16 love is put forward as the truest presentation of God, this is the highest expression of the conception of God. It passes entirely beyond the limitations of natural religion. It does not come within the category of Substance, but only those of Power and Activity. It opens the way for an altogether new presentation of religion based on the facts of moral life."
9. ἐν τούτῳ] The true nature of God’s love has now been shown, in a way which men can understand and appreciate, in the fact and the purpose of the Incarnation. God gave His best, that men might be enabled to live the life of God.

ἐν ἡμῖν] Not “among us,” still less “to us.” If the writer had meant “God’s love to us,” he would doubtless have used the Greek words which would convey that meaning, ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ εἰς ἡμᾶς. The preposition has its full force. God sent His Son that men might live. The manifestation of His love is made in those who have entered upon the life which He sent His Son to give.

tὸν μονογενῆ] The idea presented by μονογενῆς in the Johannine books would seem to be that of the one and only Son who completely reproduces the nature and character of His Father, which is concentrated in one, and is not, so to speak, divided up among many brethren. It emphasizes the completeness of the revelation of God which He is able to give, as well as the uniqueness of the gift.

ἵνα ζήσωμεν] Cf. the note on ἐν ἡμῖν. The love was manifested in a definite act with a definite object.

ev 1°] pr. καὶ αἵτω f 206f. 234. 502 (83) ἐν 78-157 (-): pr. καὶ f 114 (335).
tοῦ θεοῦ] εἰς arm-codd.
ev ἡμῖν] om. f 233-509 (2).
apοσταλκέν] apοσταλκέν K 29. 38. 42. 57 al. plus12 Ath.
o θεοῦ] om. 15. 18. 25. 98. 100 al.5 arm. aeth. Aug.

10. True love is selfless. It is not a mere response. It gives itself. The sending of God’s Son was not the answer of God to something in man. It was the outcome of the very Nature of God. Cf. Odes of Solomon, iii. 3, 4, “I should not have known how to love the Lord, if He had not loved me. For who is able to distinguish love, except the one that is loved?”

ἱλασμόν] Cf. ii. 2. God could not give Himself while men’s sins formed a barrier between them and Him. True love must sweep away the hindrances to the fulfilment of the law of its being. While Vulg. has propitiatio, Aug. has liitor, and Lucif. expiator, emphasizing the fact that that which reconciles is a person.

η γανση] + τοῦ θεοῦ sah. cop.
apοσταλκεν] apοσταλκεν K.

(b) 11, 12. Love of the Brethren the test of Fellowship.
In the light of such a manifestation of God’s love there can be no question about the obligation to mutual love among those who have experienced it. True knowledge always finds expression in action. The true nature of God cannot be made visible to the eye. His presence cannot be seen. But it is known in its results. Where love is, there we know that God abides in men. His abiding in men is the most complete expression of His love.

11. ἀγαπητοϊ] Cf. ver. 7. The loving address is here used for the sixth and last time.

οὕτως] Cf. Jn. iii. 16, of which this verse seems to be an echo. οὕτως defines the way in which God manifested the true nature of love, by giving His Son.

καὶ ημεῖς] The writer and his readers, or more generally the Christian Family, those who have experienced and appropriated the revelation of love. Those who have learned the true character of love are under the strongest obligation to carry out, in such spheres as they can, the lesson which they have learned. The proper result of divine birth is divine activity.

ο θεὸν] post ημας 1b 2581. 558. 8102. 8360 (2).
οφειλομεν καὶ ημεῖς 75 8493-173 (6).

12. θεὸν κ.τ.λ.] Cf. Jn. i. 18, where the order of the first two words is the same. The absence of the article throws the emphasis on the nature and character of God. As He is in His true nature He cannot be made visible to the eyes of men, so that they can grasp the meaning of what they see (θεᾶσθαι, contrast the ἑώρακεν of the Gospel, which merely states the fact).

ἀν κ.τ.λ.] What cannot be seen can be known by its fruits. Mutual love is a sign of the indwelling of God in men. “Through our love for each other (as Christians) we build the Temple, in which God can dwell in and among us” (Rothe). His love for men receives its most perfect expression in His giving Himself to men, and entering into fellowship with them.

αὐτοϊ] There is the usual division of opinion as to whether the genitive is subjective or objective, or whether the two meanings are to be combined, the love which comes from God and which He causes to exist in men. The context on the whole favours the view that it should be taken as subjective. God’s love to men is realized most fully in His condescending to abide in men. Cf. ver. 9, ἐφανερώθη ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ ἐν ἡμῖν.

12. θεοι] pr. αδελφοι Ια 170 (303).
vgl. Thphyl.: perfecta erit sahd.

13-16a. Proofs of Fellowship. The gift of the Spirit. The witness of those who actually saw the manifestation of love in the Life of Jesus. By means of the Spirit, of which He has given us, we are conscious that fellowship between Him and us really exists. Furthermore, the great proof of His love, the sending of His Son as Saviour of the world, rests on certain witness. We who lived with Him on earth, and have seen and understood the meaning of what we saw, can bear true witness. All who accept the fact that Jesus of Nazareth, who lived on earth as a man among men, is the Son of God, and who mould their lives in accordance with this confession, are in true fellowship with God. And we who saw Him have learned to know and to believe the love which God has for us, and shows in us.

13. The writer passes from the facts to Christian consciousness of the facts. We are assured that fellowship between God and us really exists, because He has given us of His Spirit, and the effects of His gifts are permanent. Cf. iii. 24, where the same conclusion is reached. For the use of the preposition, cf. Mt. xxv. 28, δότε ἡμῖν ἐκ τοῦ ἐλαίου ὑμῶν. For the general arrangement of the matter, cf. i Jn. ii. 5, 6.

14. Beside the internal witness of the Spirit, there is also the external witness of those who saw the great proof of God's love. Their vision was complete, and lasting in its results. The testimony, therefore, which they bear is sure.

ημείς] The word must here refer to the actual eye-witnesses of the life of Jesus on earth. The exaggeration of the view which finds "the αὐτόπται of the Province” in each use of the first person plural of the pronoun in the Epistle, should not be allowed to obscure the natural meaning of certain expressions which it contains; cf. 1 Jn. i. 1. The verb looks back to ver. 12: "God Himself no one has ever yet beheld; but we have beheld His Son.

σωτῆρα] Cf. Jn. iv. 42, δότος ἐστιν ἡμῖν ἀληθῶς ὁ σωτὴρ τοῦ κόσμου. The purpose of the mission was to restore the fellowship which had been gradually forfeited.

15. δικλονιγησ] Cf. iv. 2 and notes. The confession is stated variously; cf. iv. 2; 2 Jn. 7, and the various confessions in the Gospel. The essential point seems to be the identity of Jesus, the man who lived on earth a human life, with the Son of God, who as only-begotten Son of His Father could reveal the Father to men. In the thought of the writer no other conditions could assure the validity of the revelation and the possibility of its comprehension by man. He who "confesses" this, i.e. makes this belief the guiding principle of his life and action, is assured of the truth of his fellowship with God. Thus the work of the original witnesses is continued in the "confession" of those who "have not seen and yet have believed." Such a confession is as sure a test of Divine fellowship as "mutual love." As it cannot be true unless it issues in such mutual love, it is difficult to distinguish the two. The writer probably puts it forward rather for its value as an objective sign to others, than for its power of giving assurance to him who makes it. In the Christian community there is external as well as internal assurance to be found by those who look for it.

1 Cf. Holtzmann on 3 Jn. 9.

16a. καὶ ἡμεῖς ἐγνώκαμεν καὶ πεπιστεύκαμεν] If, as seems probable, the first person plural still refers to the writer and other teachers who, like him, had seen the Lord on earth, he is thinking of his early experiences in Galilee or Jerusalem, when growing acquaintance passed into assured faith, which had never since been lost. Contrast the order in the confession of S. Peter, Jn. vi. 69. The growth of knowledge and the growth of faith act and react on each other.

ἐν ἡμῖν] The love which God has for men is manifested in those who respond to it, in whom it issues in higher life. But perhaps it is safer to regard the preposition as a trace of the influence of Aramaic forms of expression on the writer's style.

Since God is love, he who abides in love abides in God and God in him. Thus the test of love can give full assurance with regard to the reality of our fellowship with God. It is a logical deduction from the very nature of God. Love has been made perfect in us when, and only when, we can look forward with entire confidence to the great day of God's judgment, knowing that as the exalted Christ abides in the Father's love, so we abide in it so far as that is possible under the conditions of our present existence. Where full confidence is not yet possible, love is not yet made perfect, for fear and dread have no place in true love. It drives them out completely from the sphere of its activity. For fear has in itself something of the nature of punishment, and he who experiences it has not yet been made perfect in love. How then can we say that we have love? Because our love, in whatever degree we possess it as yet, has its origin in something that is above and beyond us. It has its origin in God. It is called out in response to the love which God has for us. But our claim to love can be put to an obvious test. Love is active, and must, if it is real, go forth to those who need it. If any one claims to love God and does not show love to his brethren, his claim is not only false, but reveals a falseness of character. Love will show itself wherever an object of love is to be found. He who will not take even the first step can never reach the goal. If the sight of his brother does not call out his love, the fact shows that he cannot have love enough to reach as far as God. And for us the matter is determined, once for all, by the Master's command. He has said, "The first commandment is, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God. And the second is this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

16b. ὁ θεὸς κ.τ.λ.] Cf. ver. 8, where love is shown to be the necessary condition of knowledge of God. Here it is presented as the necessary condition of fellowship.

ὁ μένων κ.τ.λ.] Cf. ver. 12, where the writer emphasizes the fact that God's love for men is shown most completely in His willingness to "abide" in us. Here the emphasis is laid on the mutual character of the intercourse, ἐν τῷ θεῷ μένει καὶ ὁ θεὸς ἐν αὐτῷ, and especially on the human side. By abiding in love, the Christian realizes the divine fellowship.

17. ἐν τούτῳ κ.τ.λ.] Two interpretations of this verse are possible, according as the words refer to what precedes or to what follows. Ἐν τούτῳ may recapitulate the clause ἐν τῷ θεῷ μένει καὶ ὁ θεὸς ἐν αὐτῷ. Love finds its consummation in the realization of this mutual fellowship. But it would be truer to say that love is made perfect, not in fellowship generally, but in perfect fellowship; and this is hardly expressed by the words. And in the general usage of the author ἐν τούτῳ refers to what follows, whenever the sentence contains a clause which allows of such a reference. Such clauses are either added without connecting particle, or are introduced by ὅτι, ἢ, ὅταν. There is no certain instance of the construction ἐν τούτῳ ἢ.
But Jn. xv. 8 should probably be interpreted in this way (ἐν τούτῳ ἔδωκασθή ὁ πατήρ μου, ἵνα καρπὸν πολὺν φέρῃτε). And the writer's use of the purely definitive ἵνα is so well established that such a construction causes no difficulty. If ἐν τούτῳ refers to the clause introduced by ἵνα the meaning will be that love is made perfect in full confidence, It has been perfectly realized only by those who can look forward with sure confidence to the judgment of the Great Day. Such confidence is the sign of perfect love. The thought is developed further in ver. 18. Cf. also ii. 28.

παρρησίαν] See the note on ii. 28.

μεθ᾽ ἡμῶν] As contrasted with ἐν ἡμῖν (8) it is possible that the phrase may emphasize the co-operation of men in the realization of fellowship, “In fulfilling this issue, God works with man” (Westcott, who compares Ac. xv. 4). But it is at least equally possible that the usage of the Hebrew preposition מז may have influenced the choice of preposition.

ὁτι κ.τ.λ.] The ground of the assurance. Those who have attained to fellowship share, in some degree, the character of the Christ, as He is in His exalted state, in perfect fellowship with the Father. Cf. Jn. xvii. 23, ἐγὼ ἐν αὐτοῖς καὶ σὺ ἐν ἐμοί; ἵνα τετελειωμένοι εἰς ἐν. Those who are like their Judge, can await with confidence the result of His decrees. The fellowship is limited by the conditions of earthly life (ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ τῆς κρίσεως). Ὁτὸς “emphasizes the idea of transitoriness.” But so far as it goes the fellowship is real.

ἐκεῖνος] is generally used in this Epistle of the exalted Christ; cf. ii. 6, iii. 3, 5, 7, 16.

ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῆς κρίσεως] Cf. ii. 28, εὰν φανερωθῇ. However much the writer may seek to spiritualize the ordinary Christian, or even the Synoptic, eschatology, he has not eliminated from the sphere of his theological thought the idea of a final “day” of judgment, when the processes which are already at work shall reach their final issue and manifestation. The attempts which have been made to draw a distinction in this respect between the Gospel and the Epistle cannot be said to have been successful.

18. Fear, which is essentially self-centred, has no place in love, which in its perfection involves complete self-surrender.
The two cannot exist side by side. The presence of fear is a sign that love is not yet perfect. “Love cannot be mingled with fear” (Seneca, Ep. Mor. xlivi. 18).

κόλασιν ἔχει] not only “includes the punishment which it anticipates,” but is in itself of the nature of punishment. Till love is supreme, it is a necessary chastisement, a part of the divine discipline, which has its salutary office. κόλασις is used in the New Testament only here and in Mt. xxv. 46, cf. 2 Mac. iv. 38. (Contrast the use of τιμωρία, “requital.”) The expression must mean here more than “suffers punishment,” as in Hermas, S. ix. 18. 1, ο μὴ γινώσκων θεὸν καὶ πονηρευόμενος ἔχει κόλασιν ταν τῆς πονηρίας αὐτοῦ.

ἔξω βάλει] Cf. Mt. v. 13, xiii. 48; Jn. vi. 37, ix. 34, xii. 31, xv. 6. Love must altogether banish fear from the enclosure in which her work is done.

ὁ δὲ φοβούμενος] Till fear has been “cast outside,” love has not been made perfect. Cf. Philo, quod Deus sit immut. 69 (Cohn, ii. 72), τοῖς μὲν οὖν μὴν μέρος μὴν πάθος ἀνθρώπων περὶ τὸ ἐν νομίζουσιν, ἀλλὰ θεοπρεπῶς αὐτὸ δὲ αὐτὸ μόνον τιμῶσι τὸ ἀγαπᾶν οἰκείωτατον, φοβεῖσθαι δὲ τοῖς ἑτέροις, quoted by Windisch.

19. ἡμεῖς] We Christians, as in ver. 17. The point has been much disputed whether the verb (ἀγαπῶμεν) is to be interpreted as an exhortation (conjunctive) or as a statement of fact (indicative). The attempt to construe it as a conjunctive has led to various modifications of the text, the introduction of a connecting particle οὖν, never found in the true text of this Epistle (cf., however, 3 Jn. 8), or the insertion of an object for the verb (τὸν θεόν, αὐτόν, inuicem). And both modifications would be natural if the clause is to be taken as hortatory. But a further meditation on the nature of love as manifested in us is more suitable to the context, and it gives a deeper meaning to the words. Our love is not self-originated. It has a divine origin. It is called out in response to what God has given. Thus interpreted, the words offer a far more powerful incentive to the exercise of love than a mere exhortation, and they have their natural place in the writer’s thoughts. God is love; by the path of love we can enter into His fellowship (16): in our case love is made perfect in proportion as it casts out fear and establishes full confidence (17, 18). And it rests on something greater and stronger than our own powers. It is the response of our nature to the love which God Himself has shown. Such love which He has called out in us must find an object. If it fails to find out the nearer object, it will never reach the further (19, 20). And besides this, there is the Lord's express command (21).

αὐτός] The variant ὁ θεός is probably a true explanation. But αὐτός is not only better attested, it is more in harmony with the writer's style.

πρῶτος] Cf. Jn. i. 42.

πρωτος] πρωτον 5. 8. 25. 40. 69. ascr.

20. ἐαν τις εἴπῃ] Cf. i. 6, ἐὰν εἴπωμεν, and the more definite ὁ λέγων (ii. 4). The false claim is mentioned quite generally. At the same time, it is not improbable that the false teachers, who claimed to possess a superior knowledge of the true God, may also have laid claim to a superior love of the Father, who was "good," and not merely "just," as the God of the Old Testament. And the emphasis laid throughout the Epistle on the duty of mutual love makes it clear that their "superior" love had been more or less conspicuous in its failure to begin at home, or to master the import of the Lord's verdict, ἐφ᾽ ὅσον οὐκ ἐποιήσατε ἑνὶ τούτων τῶν ἐλαχίστων, οὐδὲ ἐμοὶ ἐποιήσατε.

µισῇ] Cf. ii. 9.

ψευστης ἐστίν] He not only states what is false (ψεύδεται), but reveals by his false claim a real falseness of character, if the difference between two possible forms of expression is to be pressed.

ὁ γὰρ κτλ.] Love must express itself in action. He who refuses to make use of the obvious opportunities, which his position in this world affords him, cannot entertain the highest love.

ὁν ἑώρακεν] Cf. Oec. ἐφελκυστικὸν γὰρ ὅρασις πρὸς ἀγάπην, and the saying of Philo, de Decalog, § 23 (Cohn, iv. 296), ἀμήχανον δὲ εὐσεβείσθαι τὸν ἀόρατον ὑπὸ τῶν ἐκ τῶν εἰς τὸς ἐμφανὲς καὶ ἐγγὺς ὄντας ἀσεβοῦστων.

οὐ δύναται] The reading of Ν B, etc., is perhaps more impressive and more in agreement with the writer's love of absolute statement than the variant which Westcott condemns as "the rhetorical phrase of the common text" (πῶς δύναται). At the same time the latter reading suggests a new point. The man who rejects the obvious method of giving expression to love in the case of those whom he has seen, has no way left by which he can attempt the harder task of reaching out to that which is invisible.

21. The duty of love not only follows necessarily from what God has done for us, it rests on His direct commandment.

exouev naturally refers to God, as the variant in the Vulgate interprets it, though here as elsewhere, in the language of meditation, when the writer is of Semitic origin, a change of person is by no means impossible.

The most direct statement of the command is Mk. xii. 29 ff., where the Lord quotes the command of Dt. vi. 4, 5. The writer no doubt knew the Marcan passage, even if he had not himself heard the saying which it records, when it was originally spoken. Cf. also Jn. xiii. 34.
spiritual birth are analogous. What is true of the human family is also true of the Divine Society. If we love the Father who hath "begotten us again," and the reality of that love is shown in our active obedience (ποιῶμεν) to His commands, we may be assured that our love to His other (spiritual) children is real and sincere. Every one that believeth that Jesus is the Christ shows by that belief, as it manifests itself in word and deed as well as in intellectual conviction, that he has experienced the new birth. Those who are "born of God" must love all His children, as surely as it is natural that any child should love his father's other children.

1. πᾶς ὁ πιστεύων κ.τ.λ. Cf. Jn. i. 12 f. ὅσοι δὲ ἔλαβον αὐτόν, ἐδωκεν αὐτοῖς ἐξουσίαν τέκνα θεοῦ γενέσθαι, τοῖς πιστεύοντες εἰς τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ... oί... ἐκ θεοῦ ἐγεννήθησαν. Where true faith in Jesus as God's appointed messenger to men is present, there the new birth has taken place. The writer does not state whether faith is the cause or the result of the new birth. The point is not present to his thoughts, and his argument does not require its elucidation. What he wishes to emphasize is the fact that they go together. Where true faith is the new birth is a reality, and has abiding and permanent consequences. The believer has been born of God. But incidentally the tenses "make it clear that the Divine Begetting is the antecedent, not the consequent of the believing." "Christian belief, which is essentially the spiritual recognition of spiritual truth, is a function of the Divine Life as imparted to men" (Law).

ὁ πιστεύων] Πιστεύειν ὅτι expresses belief in the truth of a statement or thesis. The phrase used in the passage quoted above from the Gospel (πιστεύειν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα) suggests complete and voluntary submission to the guidance of a Person, as possessed of the character which his name implies. But though the writer is careful to distinguish the two, he would have been unable to conceive of any true faith stopping short at intellectual conviction of the abstract truth of a statement like that which follows in the clause introduced by ὅτι, which had no effect on the shaping of a man's conduct. He would have regarded the belief that Jesus is the Christ as inseparable from faith in Jesus as Christ. Neither belief nor knowledge are for him purely intellectual processes.

Ἰησοῦς ἐστίν ὁ Χριστός] The exact form of this confession of faith is conditioned by the antichrists' denial (cf. ii. 22, ὅ ἄριστομεν ὅτι Ἰησοῦς οὐκ ἐστίν ὁ Χριστός). It lays stress on the identity of the man Jesus with the Christ who became incarnate in Him, as opposed to the theories, then prevalent, of the descent of a higher power on Jesus at the Baptism, which left Him before the Crucifixion.
V. 1, 2. | NOTES ON I JOHN

καὶ πᾶς ὁ ἀγαπῶν κ.τ.λ. | The child’s love for its parent naturally carries with it love for brothers and sisters. The step in the argument, “Every one that is born of God loveth God,” is passed over as too obvious to require statement. We are again reminded that we have to deal with the language of meditation.

οἱ χριστοὶ εἶναι 1 b διὸ 601 (440).

γεγένηται lα διὸ 605 ε., διὸ 609 ε., 552 ε., 226. 1402 (69).

2. As usual a test is added by which the sincerity of the love may be determined. ἐν τούτῳ points forward. This is clearly the established usage of ἐν τούτῳ in the Epistle, but difficulty has been felt in thus explaining it here, because the clause to which it points forward is introduced by ὅταν, instead of the usual constructions, ἐάν, ὅτι, or a disconnected sentence. But the difficulty is not serious, and it is probable that ἐν τούτῳ should be interpreted as usual. Whenever our love to God is clear, and issues in active obedience to His will, we know by this that our love for His children is real. Weiss’ explanation, which makes ἐν τούτῳ refer back to the statement immediately preceding (πᾶς ὁ ἀγαπῶν κ.τ.λ.), is perhaps at first sight easier. “When, or as soon as, we love God, we love also the children of God, in accordance with the law that love for him who begots has as its necessary consequence love for those whom he has begotten” (p. 150). Thus the duty of loving the brethren is deduced from the natural law of affection, as well as being directly commanded by God. But the other interpretation is more in accordance with the writer’s wish to emphasize the Divine origin of love. There is certainly no need to reduce the verse to the merest repetition of what has been already said, by the transposition of the objects “Hereby we know that we love God, when we love the children of God,” as Grotius and others have suggested.

τὰ τέκνα τοῦ θεοῦ | The use of this phrase instead of “the brethren” is significant. True love, which has its origin in God, is called out by that in its object which is akin to the Divine. Every one who has been born of God must love all those who have been similarly ennobled. Love of God bears witness to, and has witness borne to itself by, love of the godlike.
The reading τηρῶμεν is clearly a correction to the more usual phrase which occurs in ver. 3. In itself the reading of B, etc., is more forcible. It emphasizes the active character of the obedience which testifies to the love felt for God and therefore for the brethren.

3. The first clause justifies the addition of the last clause of ver. 2, καὶ τὰς ἐντολὰς αὐτοῦ ποιῶμεν. Obedience to His commands is the necessary outcome of love to God. There is no such thing as true love of God which does not issue in obedience.

αὐτὴ... ἢν] Cf. Jn. xvii. 3. The definitive ἢν generally introduces an ideal not yet actually attained. This is perhaps the only class of ideas whose contents it is used to define.

τηρῶμεν] Contrast ver. 2 (ποιῶμεν). Actual “doing” is the test of love. But love includes more of obedience than the actual carrying out of definite commands. It accepts them as the expression of an underlying principle, which is capable of moulding the whole character, and which must be kept alive and given scope to work.

βαρεῖαι] Cf. Mt. xxiii. 4, δεσμεύουσιν δὲ φορτία βαρέα: Lk. xi. 46, φορτίζετε τοὺς ἀνθρώπους φορτία δυσβάστακτα: and contrast Mt. xi. 30, τὸ φορτίον μου ἐλαφρόν ἐστιν. The word cannot here mean “difficult to fulfil.” It suggests the idea of a heavy and oppressive burden. The commands may be in themselves difficult to carry out, and yet not burdensome, if the Christian is possessed of adequate power to fulfil them, in virtue of his Christian standing and love: dilige et quod vis fac (Augustine). Windisch regards vv. 3 and 4 as intended to show the possibility of fulfilling the Divine commands, and of realizing the Divine ideal for men. (1) On the side of God, He does not demand what is too hard for men. Cf. Philo, de spec. leg. i. 299, p. 257, αἰτεῖται... ὃ διάνοια, παρὰ σοῦ ὃ θεὸς οὐδὲν βαρὺ καὶ ποικίλον ἢ δύσεργον, ἀλλὰ ἀπλοῦν παῦν καὶ ράδιον. ταῦτα δ᾿ ἐστίν ἀγαπάν αὐτὸν ὡς εὐεργέτην, εἰ δὲ μὴ, φοβεῖσθαι γοῦν ὡς ἀρχοντα καὶ κύριον... καὶ τῶν ἐντολῶν αὐτοῦ περιέχεσθαι καὶ τὰ δίκαια τιμᾶν. (2) On man’s side, the necessary power has been given to him. But this interpretation ignores the form of the sentence (ὅτι πᾶν κ.τ.λ.).

γαρ] om. H δ (Ψ) K² (S) sah² boh-codd.

4. And this power each Christian has, in virtue of the new birth from God. The statement is made in its most abstract form (πᾶν τὸ γεγεννημένον) which emphasizes the power of the new birth rather than its possession by each individual (πᾶς ὁ γεγεννημένος). Every one who is born of God has within himself a power strong enough to overcome the resistance of all the powers of the world, which hinder him from loving God.

καὶ αὐτὴ κ.τ.λ.] For the form of expression, cf. i. 5; Jn. i. 19.
Our faith, the faith that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, the Son of God, accepted not as an intellectual conviction but as a rule of life, overcame in our case the powers of the world, which fight for a different principle of life. The aorist (νικήσασα) naturally points to a definite act, or fact. The writer must be thinking either of the conversion of each member of the community, “the moment when he ἐπίστευσε,” or else of some well-known event in the history of the Church or Churches addressed. The most natural reference is to the definite withdrawing of the false teachers from the fellowship of the Church. There is no obvious reference to the victory of Christ over the world (cf. Jn. xvi. 33, ἐγὼ νεκρεῖα τὸν κόσμον) which His followers share in virtue of their faith, i.e. in so far as they unite themselves with Him.

πας ο γεγεννημενος Ἰα 178 (156).
ημοι Ν Α Β Κ Ρ αλ. πλερ. κατ. vg. etc.] υμων Λ 3. 42. 57. 98. 105. 191 al. fere.29 aeth.

5. τίς ἐστιν] Cf. ii. 22, τίς ἐστιν ὁ ψευστὴς εἰ μὴ ὁ θεοῦ. The appeal is to practical experience. He who has realized what Jesus of Nazareth really was, and he alone, has in himself the power which overcomes the forces of the world which draw men away from God; cf. 1 Co. xv. 57.

ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ] Cf. verse 1, ὁ χριστός. The fuller phrase brings out the meaning more clearly, though the writer probably means much the same by both titles. He varies his phrase to leave no doubt about his meaning. The πρῶτον ψεῦδος of the false teachers was the denial, not that Jesus was the Messiah of the Jews, but that He was the complete revelation of the Father, the assertion that the higher Power that was in Him was only temporarily connected with Him during a part of His earthly life.

66*1. 68. 69 aecr al. fere.15 cat. cav. demid. tol. cop. syr. arm. Did. Cyr.
Thphyl. (τίς ἐστιν B cav. demid. tol. Did.).
ο πιστευων] ο πιστεύσας P.
ησυς + Christs arm-codd. boh-codd.
ο υος] pr. o χριστος 13. 56: o χι Jα 388 (56).

6-9. He, the pre-existent Son of God, was sent from heaven by God to do His will. He came to earth to fulfil His Mission. In His fulfilment of it, two events are prominent: the Baptism by which He was consecrated to His Messianic work, and the Passion by which He completed His work of atonement and propitiation. His coming was not in the water of John’s Baptism alone, it was realized even more fully in the Blood which He shed upon the Cross. "He that came" is the title which best characterizes His work. The function of the Spirit was different. It was to bear witness. He was the witness-bearer. And He was fitted for His office, for truth is of the essence of His being. He is the truth. And the witness may be trusted, for it is threefold. The witness-bearers are three: the Spirit, whose very nature qualifies Him for the office; the water of John's Baptism, after which He was declared to be the Son of God; and the blood shed upon the Cross, where testimony was again given to the fact that He is the Son of God, for His death was not like that of other men. Thus the three witnesses all tend to the same point. They establish the one truth that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God.

6. Of the many interpretations of this passage which have been suggested, only three deserve serious consideration: (1) A reference to the two Christian Sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist naturally suggested itself to many interpreters of the Epistle, especially in view of the 4th and 6th chapters of the Gospel. But it is open to more than one fatal objection. If ὕδωρ can be satisfactorily explained of Baptism, αἷμα is never found in the New Testament as a designation of the Eucharist. And, secondly, the form of the sentence, ὃ ἐλθὼν δι' ὕδατος καὶ αἷματος, almost necessitates a reference to definite historical facts in the life of Christ on earth which could be regarded as peculiarly characteristic of the Mission which He "came" to fulfil. If the writer had intended to refer to the Christian Sacraments, he must have said ὃ ἐρχόμενος. It is hardly necessary to point out that any interpretations which refer one of the expressions to a rite instituted by Christ, and the other to something which happened to Him (as, e.g., the Christian rite of baptism, and the atoning death on the Cross), are even less satisfactory. See Cambridge Greek Testament.

(2) The reference to the incident recorded in Jn. xix. 34 was also natural, considering the stress laid upon it by the author of the Gospel, and the exact language in which he records the result of the piercing of the Lord's side by the soldier's lance, ἐξῆλθεν αἷμα καὶ ὕδωρ. This incident gives a definite fact which would justify the use of the aorist (ὁ ἐλθὼν). And the difference in order (αἷμα καὶ ὕδωρ) offers no real difficulty. It is easily explicable as a consequence of the writer's desire to throw special emphasis on the αἷμα, which he develops further in the next clause, οὐκ ἐν τῷ ὕδατι μόνον ἀλλ' ἐν τῷ ὕδατι καὶ τῷ οὐρανῷ. But it is difficult to see how this incident could be regarded as characterizing the Lord's Mission as a whole. No doubt the incident, as the writer had seen it or heard the account of it from a trustworthy and competent witness, had made a deep impression upon him. It had suggested to him the significance of “blood” and “water” as symbolizing two characteristic aspects of the Lord’s work, cleansing and life-giving. But the incident itself could hardly be thought of as the means whereby He accomplished His work. As an explanation of the actual words used, ὃ ἐλθὼν δὲ ὕδατος καὶ αἷματος, it fails to satisfy the requirements of the case.

(3) We are thus thrown back on the explanation of Tertullian, Theophylact, and many modern commentators, who see in the words a reference to the Baptism of Jesus by John the Baptist, in which at the beginning of His ministry He was consecrated to His Messianic work and received the gift of the Spirit descending upon Him and abiding on Him, and the Death on the Cross by which His work was consummated. The terms used refer definitely to the historical manifestation of the Son of God, and compel us to look for definite and characteristic events in that history by means of which it could be said that His mission was accomplished, His “coming” effected. The two great events at the beginning and the end of the ministry satisfactorily fulfill these conditions. At the Baptism He was specially consecrated for His public work, and endowed with the Spirit which enabled Him to carry it out. And His work was not finished before Calvary. The Death on the Cross was its consummation, not a mere incident in the life of an ordinary man, after the Higher Power had left Him, which had temporarily united itself with His human personality for the purposes of His mission of teaching.

The middle clause of the verse distinguishes two facts, and lays emphasis on the latter. The repetition of both preposition and article brings this out clearly. The statement is as precise as grammar can make it. And the whole statement, including what is said about the function of the Spirit as witness-bearer, is no doubt conditioned by the special form of erroneous teaching which had made so precise a statement necessary.

Though Tertullian apparently adheres to this interpretation, his mention of it shows the early connection of this passage with the incident at the Crucifixion, recorded in Jn. xix. 34. Cf. Tert. de Baptismo, 16, “Uenerat enim per aquam et sanguinem, sicut Ioannes scripsit, ut aqua tingueretur, sanguine glorificaretur, proinde nos facere aqua uocatos, sanguine electos. Hos duos baptismos de uulnere perfossi lateris emisit, quatenus qui in sanguinem eius crederent, aqua lauarentur, qui aqua lavissent, etiam sanguinem potarent.”

The combination of the historical and sacramental explanation is well illustrated by Bede, “Qui uenit per aquam et sanguinem, aquam uidelicet lauacri et sanguinem suae passionis: non solum baptizari propter nostram ablutionem dignatus est, ut nobis baptismi sacramentum consecraret ac traderet, uerum etiam sanguinem suum dedit pro nobis, sua nos passione redimens, cuius sacramentis semper refecti nutritemur ad salutem.” Considering his usual dependence upon Augustine, this may be taken as probably giving that writer’s comment on the passage, especially if we compare his comment on the passage in the Gospel (Tract. cxx. 2), “Aperuit, ut illic quodammodo uitae ostium panderetur, unde Sacramenta Ecclesiae manauerunt, sine quibus ad uitam quae uera uita est non intratur. Ille sanguis in remissionem fusus est peccatorum: aqua illa salutare temperat poulum; haec et lauacrum praestat et potum.”

The passage was naturally allegorized by the Alexandrian School; cf. Clement, “Iste est qui uenit per aquam et sanguinem” et iterum “quia tres sunt qui testificantur, Spiritus, quod est uita, et aqua quod est regeneratio ac fides, et sanguis, quod est cognitio,” where the interpretation illustrates the absence of historical sense which usually characterizes the Allegorists. It would, of course, be possible to interpret the passage of the whole of the life of Jesus on earth, in which the Son of God was manifested in flesh, ὕδωρ and αἷμα being used as symbols of two different aspects of the work which He accomplished during that life, as, e.g., cleansing and life-giving, according to the recognized Biblical usage of the terms. But if this had been intended the context must have made it plain that this was the meaning which the writer wished to convey. His readers could hardly have deduced it from the passage as it stands.

ὁὗτος] Jesus, who is both Christ and Son of God. For this use of οὗτος to emphasize the character of the subject as previously described, see Jn. i. 2, 7, ill. 2 (xxl. 24); 1 Jn. ii. 22, cf. 2. Jn. 7. He who came was both Christ and Son of God. The incarnation of the Son of God in human nature was not a merely temporary connection during part only of the earthly life of Jesus of Nazareth.

ὁ ἐλθών] The article is significant. He is one whose office or work is rightly characterized by the description given. And the aorist naturally refers to definite historical facts, or to the whole life regarded as one fact. It is hardly safe to find in the expression ὃ ἐλθών a distinct reference to the (Ὁ) Messianic title ἐρχόμενος, and so discover in the phrase a special indication of the office and work of Messiah. The idea emphasized in this and similar expressions would seem to be generally the course of action taken in obedience to the command of God. The “coming” of the Son corresponds to the “sending” of the Father. It expresses the fulfilment of the Mission which He was sent to accomplish. As that Mission was Messianic in character, Messianic ideas may often be suggested by the phrase, but they are secondary. “He who accomplished the Mission entrusted to Him by God” seems to be the meaning of the word.

δι’ ὕδατος καὶ αἵματος] The difficulty of the phrase is reflected in the attempts to modify the text. Cf. the critical note. The phrase should express means by which the “coming” was accomplished, or elements by which it was characterized. Cf. 2 Co. v. 7, διὰ πίστεως περιπατεῖν. The tense of ἐλθών excludes any primary reference to the Christian sacraments, even if ὕδωρ and αἷμα could be used to indicate them (see note at the beginning of the verse). As has been pointed out, the order of the words is not in itself decisive against such a reference or against a reference to the incident recorded in Jn. xix. 34 (ἐξῆλθεν αἷμα καὶ ὕδωρ). The real objection to the latter view is the difficulty of seeing how that incident could be regarded as characteristic means by which the “coming” was accomplished. It may well have suggested to the writer the peculiar significance of two aspects of the coming, but can hardly be regarded as an event by means of which the coming was fulfilled. On the other hand, the Baptism and the Crucifixion were both important factors in the carrying out of the Mission which He came to fulfil, and in this light they stand out more prominently than any other two recorded events of the Ministry.

οὐκ ἐν τῷ ὕδατι μόνον] The writer evidently feels that further precision is necessary to make his meaning clear and unmistakable. It is clear that he has to deal with a form of teaching which denied the reality, or at least the supreme importance, of the coming ἐν τῷ αἵματι. The use of the article is natural, where the reference is to what has been mentioned before. The repetition of both article and preposition certainly suggests that two different events are referred to, a point which the earlier phrase δι’ ὕδατος καὶ αἵματος left doubtful.

The difference in meaning between the two prepositions used is not very clear. The events may be regarded as instruments by which the Mission was accomplished; or, on the other hand, water and blood, or rather the realities which they symbolize, may be thought of as spheres in which the work, or purpose, of the Mission was characteristically realized. But the influence of Semitic forms of expression may have gone far towards obliterating any difference in meaning between the two forms of expression. Cf. Lv. xvi. 3 (ἐν μόσχῳ); 1 Co. iv. 21 (ἐν ράβδῳ . . . ἢ ἐν ἀγάπῃ); He. ix. 12 (διὰ τοῦ ἱδίου αἵματος εἰσῆλθεν), 25 (εἰσέρχεται . . . ἐν αἵματι ἀλλοτρίῳ).

καὶ τὸ πνεῦμα κ.τ.λ.] Τὸ μαρτυροῦν expresses the characteristic office of τὸ πνεῦμα, as ὁ ἐλθὼν does of οὗτος. It is not merely equivalent to μαρτυροῦν. Christ was the fuller of the Divine plan. Cf. He. x. 7 (Ps. xl. 8), τότε εἶπον ἰδὼν ἥκω, ἐν κεφαλίδι βιβλίου γέγραπται περὶ ἐμοῦ τοῦ ποιῆσαι, ὁ θεὸς, τὸ θέλημα σου. The special function of the Spirit is to bear witness to what the Christ was and came to do. It is not improbable that in the false teaching which is here combated, a totally different function had been assigned to the Spirit (cf. Introduction, p. xlix). We may, perhaps, see a parallel instance in the description of the proper function of the Baptist contained in the Prologue of the Gospel, (οὐκ ἦν ἐκεῖνος τὸ φῶς) ἀλλ’ ἐνα μαρτυρήσῃ περὶ τοῦ φωτός. To the Baptist also some had assigned a different and a higher function. Perhaps, however, the sequence of thought in the passage as a whole may be brought out more clearly by a simpler interpretation, which does not exclude a secondary reference to the ideas which have been suggested. “He” came both by water and by blood. Both bore witness to the character of His Mission. But there was other witness, and more important. The Spirit is the witness-bearer. And so the witness is threefold. It fulfils the requirements of legally valid attestation. If we recognize the proper place and function of the Spirit, we gain assurance which cannot be shaken.

The present tense excludes the need of any definite historical reference in the case of the Spirit, as, for instance, the Voice at the Baptism, or the Voice which spake from heaven shortly before the Passion (Jn. xii. 28).

The best explanation of the author’s meaning is to be found in the account of the function of the Paraclete in Jn. xv. 26, τό πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας, ὃ παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς ἐκπορεύεται, ἐκεῖνος μαρτυρήσει περὶ ἐμοῦ. Cf. also Jn. xiv. 26, xvi. 8-10, 13-15.

Either declarative or causal. The former gives a possible meaning. The Spirit “carries with it immediately the consciousness of its truth and reality,” is in itself the best witness to its own nature, which is truth. But this is alien to the context. The emphasis is on the function of witnessing. This function the Spirit can perform perfectly, because the Spirit is the truth. The very nature of the Spirit is truth. Cf. Jn. xv. 26. By its very nature it is not only capable of bearing true witness, but it is also constrained to do so. It cannot deny itself.
V. 6-8.

NOTES ON I JOHN

137

ὅτι αὕτη κιτιλ.} Such witness is greater, and therefore more worthy of our acceptance, because it is Divine witness, and deals with a subject on which God, and God alone, is fully competent to speak. It concerns His Son. God has borne witness concerning His Son. In this case the Divine witness alone is ἀληθινή in the full sense of the term, though other kinds of witness may be true so far as they go.

The reading στι is undoubtedly right. If the reading ἥν, of the Textus Receptus, be adopted, the αὕτη must refer back to the witness already described, i.e. that borne by the three witnesses, the Spirit, the water, and the blood, or by the one witness, the Spirit, who interprets the evidence of the historical facts. The witness meant must be the witness borne to the truth that Jesus is the Christ. If στι is accepted, it may be taken in three ways: (1) Causal. In this case αὕτη must refer to what has preceded, the witness already described. Such is the witness, Divine and legally valid, for God really has borne witness to His Son. By laying the stress on the verb μεμαρτύρηκεν it is perhaps possible to make sense of the passage in this way. But such an interpretation is very harsh, and not in conformity with the author's style.

(2) στι. This is the witness, i.e. that which He has borne concerning His Son. This use of στι in the Johannine writings is not certainly established, though perhaps we should compare Jn. viii. 25, τὴν ἀρχὴν ὅ τι λαλῶ ὑμῖν. In the present context it would be intolerably harsh.

(3) It is far more natural and in accordance with the author's style (cf. Jn. iii. 19, αὕτη δὲ εἰσίν ἡ κρίσις στι τὸ φῶς ἐλήλυθεν κ.τ.λ.) to regard the στι as declarative. The value of the witness consists in this, that He has given it concerning His Son. There can be no more trustworthy witness, so far as competence to speak is concerned, than that which a father bears to his own son. The essence of the witness is that it is the testimony of God to His Son. In the Gospel, μαρτυρεῖν peri is very frequent (i. 7, 8, 15, ii. 25, v. 31, 32, etc.), elsewhere very rare.

10. He who trusts himself to the guidance of the Son has in his own experience the witness which God bore to Him, it has become part of himself. He who does not accept the witness as true has not only missed the truth, but has made God a liar; for he has set aside as false the witness which God has borne concerning His own Son.

ἐν αὐτῷ in himself, as is made clear in the paraphrase of ἐν (ἐαυτῷ). The passage must describe the “testimonium spiritus internum.”

δ ὁ μὴ πιστεύων] The subjective negative is rightly used. It lays emphasis on the character rather than the fact of non-belief. A general class is described by its significant characteristic. But in N.T. o with the participle is rare, in the Johannine writings only Jn. x. 12. See J. H. Moulton, Gr. of N.T. Grk. i. p. 231.

τῷ θεῷ] This construction (c. dat.) expresses, as usually, acceptance of the statement rather than surrender to the person. The variants τῷ Ἰησοῦ Christo, miss the point of the verse.

ψεύστην] Cf. i. το. There is no room for ignorance or misconception. To reject the witness is to deny the truthfulness of God. He has spoken and acted deliberately, and with absolute clearness. The testimony has been borne. The things were not done in a corner. The witness must therefore either be accepted or rejected. It cannot be ignored or explained away.

πεποίηκεν] The tense suggests a definite choice of which the effects abide. The rejection has been made, and its effects are inevitable. The aorist (οὐκ ἐπίστευσεν, A, etc.) is not so forcible.

οὐ πεπίστευκεν] The negative emphasizes the actual fact rather than its character (contrast ὁ μὴ πιστεύων). The choice has been made, and its consequences are manifest.

οὐ πεπίστευκεν εἰς τὴν μαρτυρίαν] The nearest parallel to this expression is Jn. iii. 23 (πολλοὶ ἐπίστευσαν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ, i.e. believed on Jesus as Messiah, as being that which His name implied, and were ready to follow Him as Messiah, till they discovered how different His conception of the Messianic office was from theirs). It seems to denote devotion to a person possessed of those qualities which the witness borne to him announces, or at least to the idea which is expressed in that witness.

ἡν μεμαρτύρηκεν κ.τ.λ.] The phrases of ver. 9 are repeated for emphasis; each point is dwelt upon. The witness has been borne, once for all; it cannot be ignored or set aside. It has been borne by God Himself, in a case where His word alone can be final, as it concerns His own Son. In the writer's view there can be no excuse for refusing to accept evidence which is so clear and satisfactory. Cf. Rothe, “If God did not will that men should believe on Jesus, He led men into a terrible temptation. So if we would keep our conception of God pure, we must ascribe this intention to Him in His ordering of the world. We generally put forward prominently whatever tells against Faith, but leave on one side what speaks for it. We ought first to answer satisfactorily the question, how it could be possible that this Faith should so widely permeate humanity before we investigate the force of our doubts, and then we should rest assured that Christianity is non sine numine”; a striking comment, even if it can hardly be said to be called out by the exact expressions of the text.

11. At last the witness, some of the essential characteristics of which have been already described, is actually defined. So far the writer has only taught his readers that it is Divine witness, borne by a father to his son, and that those who believe on the son have it in themselves, as a possession which experience has made part of themselves. Now he definitely states in what it consists. God bore witness to His Son when He gave life to men,—that higher spiritual life which they can realize and make their own only in so far as they unite themselves to Jesus, the Christ, the Son of God.

The witness which God bore consisted in the fact that He gave life to men, by sending His Son that men might have life in Him. Cf. Jn. x. 10, ἐγὼ ἦλθον ἵνα ζωὴν ἔχωσιν καὶ περισσὸν ἔχωσιν. The sending of the Son on a mission, truly characterized by the Water of the Baptism and the Blood shed on the Cross, and of which the object was to implant a new life in men, was the witness borne by God to the nature and character of Jesus of Nazareth.

ζωὴν αἰώνιον] The anarthrous phrase emphasizes character or quality. The gift was something which is best described as “spiritual life.”

ἐδωκέν] The tense emphasizes the fact, apart from its consequences. The reference is to the historic fact of the mission of Him who came by Water and by Blood.
We Christians. The gift of life is a witness only where it has been received. This clause is part of the "witness," not an additional statement made about the life. The witness is the gift of a life which is in the Son.

This verse explains more fully the last clause of the preceding verse. It is probably of the nature of an appeal to the reader's experience. Those who lived with Christ on earth found that they gained from Him a new power which transformed their life into a new and higher life. And the later generations had similar experience by which to judge, though they had not actually companied with Him during His life on earth.

In the negative statement there are two slight changes which have their significance: (1) The addition of του θεου to τον υιον. God is the source of life. The Son of God alone can give it to men. He that cannot gain it from that source cannot find it. (2) The position of την ζωην, which is placed before the verb, and thus becomes more emphatic. Whatever else the man may have in the way of higher endowments, spiritual life is not within his grasp. In the positive statement the emphasis was laid on the actual possession (εχει την ζωην). We have here another close parallel with the Gospel (see Jn. iii. 36).

The negative (μη) generalizes the statement. A class of men is described who are distinguished by this characteristic.

I have written thus about belief in Jesus as the Son of God, and the witness of the Spirit, and the witness of God, which consists in the life which He gave to men through Jesus Christ, in order that you might feel assurance as to the possession of true life, you who believe in Jesus who is the Son of God. Such confidence is realized in prayer, in knowing by experience that, whenever we ask anything of God according to His will, He hears our prayer. And if we are thus conscious that God has heard, we already possess, in anticipation, the thing we asked for. The Almighty Sovereign has said, "Let it be," there is no further doubt about the matter, even though actual possession may be delayed for long years. This is more clearly seen in intercession for the brethren. If any man see his fellow-Christian sinning, so long as his sinning is not such as leads inevitably to final separation from Christ and the life which God gives in Him, he will naturally intercede for him, and will gain life for him, even if it be long delayed, in the case of all whose sin is not unto death. There is sin which must lead, if persisted in, to final exclusion from life. I do not say that this comes within the sphere of Christian intercession. But in any case there is full scope for intercession. For all unrighteousness is sin, and there is such a thing as sin which does not necessarily lead to final exclusion from life.

ταῦτα ἔγραψα] Cf. ii. 26, where the reference is clearly to the preceding section about the False Teachers. Cf. also ii. 14, which the triple ἔγραψα probably refers to that part of the Epistle which had already been written. The present verse does not really present an exact parallel to the conclusion of the Gospel (Jn. xx. 31) which immediately precedes the appendix (ch. xxi.). Even if the reference is to the whole Gospel and not to the σημεῖα recorded in ch. xx., that reference is determined by the preceding words (ἀ οὐκ ἔστιν γεγραμμένα ἐν το βιβλίῳ τούτῳ). Here it would seem most natural to refer the words to the preceding section of the Epistle (v. 1-12), in which the writer has put forward his view of Faith in Jesus, the Christ, the Son of God, as the necessary condition of the realization of that spiritual life which God has given to men through Jesus Christ, and which again is the real witness of God to the nature and character of His Son. The following explanation of ὑμῖν as those who believe in the name of the Son of God, makes the reference to the whole of this section almost certain.

ὑμῖν κ.τ.λ.] For the separation of the explanatory clause (τοῖς πιστεύουσιν κ.τ.λ.), cf. ver. 16, δώσει αὐτῷ ὕπη, τοῖς ἀμαρτάνουσιν μὴ πρὸς βίαντον, where the change in number creates a still greater strangeness of expression, and Jn. i. 12, ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς ἐξουσίαν τέκνα θεοῦ γενέσθαι, τοῖς πιστεύουσιν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ.

This separation of τοῖς πιστεύουσιν κ.τ.λ. from ὑμῖν has led to several attempts to improve the text: (1) The clause τοῖς πιστεύουσιν . . . θεοῦ has been added immediately after ὑμῖν in the Receptus. (2) This clause has been retained in its proper place; but for τοῖς πιστεύουσιν has been substituted (a) the nominative, ὑμῖν πιστεύετε, or (b) a second final clause, καὶ ἵνα πιστεύσητε. The nominative (2a) is found with and without the insertion of a clause, τοῖς πιστεύουσιν, etc., immediately after ὑμῖν. Thus, on the assumption that the reading of B (ὑμῖν ἵνα εἰδῆτε ὅτι ἔχετε αἰώνιον τοῖς πιστεύουσιν κ.τ.λ.) is original, the genesis of the other variants can be easily explained. The parallels quoted above show that it presents a text completely in harmony with the writer's style.

ἵνα εἰδῆτε] Cf. ii. 1, ἵνα μὴ ἁμάρτητε, and iii. 24, ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκομεν. There are many signs in the Epistle of the writer's consciousness that his readers' loss of their first enthusiasm and zeal for the Christian faith had led to their feeling uncertain about their position. They lacked "assurance."

εἰδῆτε The knowledge which they need must be intuitive. If they realize who and what the Christ is, and the relation in which they stand to Him, they will at once "perceive and know" that they are in possession of life.

πιστεύουσιν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα] Cf. ver. 10 and Jn. ii. 23. The phrase must imply devotion to a person possessed of the qualities which his name denotes. It is unlikely that πιστεύουσιν is used with the two constructions (¢. dat., εἰς ¢. acc.) in the same passage in exactly the same sense. Here the full force of the construction with εἰς is needed to bring out the sense. The knowledge follows as a matter of course where the self-surrender is complete.

14. καὶ αὕτη] The object of the preceding section was to produce assurance in the readers that they were in possession of the new life. This assurance is now described as παρρησία, boldness or confidence, with perhaps special reference to the original meaning of the word, absolute freedom of speech. It is said to consist in the fact that God hears them whenever they ask anything according to His will, i.e. it is realized in true prayer, which always brings with it the consciousness that it is heard. This is the fourth mention of the Christian's confidence; we have it twice in relation to the Judgment (ii. 28, iv. 17), and twice in relation to prayer (iii. 21 and here).

ἡν ἔχομεν πρὸς αὐτόν] which we have and enjoy in realized fellowship with God. In describing relations, πρὸς generally denotes that which "goes out towards," a relation realized in active intercourse and fellowship. Cf. Jn. i. 1, 2; Mk. vi. 3 (σὺν εἰσὶν ... ὡς πρὸς ἡμᾶς; living our life).

ὅτι] One of the common constructions used by the writer to introduce the description of that to which αὕτη, or ἐν τούτῳ, or some such expression refers. Our παρρησία with God is based on the fact that He hears whatsoever we ask κατὰ τὸ θέλημα αὐτοῦ.

ἐὰν τι κ.τ.λ.] The necessary condition of the hearing; subject to this condition, that it is not in opposition to the Divine will, the hearing is assured whatever the petition may be.

αἰτώμεθα] The more subjective form of expression is chosen. But it is doubtful whether any definite and clear difference in meaning between the middle and the active can be pressed. Cf. Mt. xx. 20, 22 (αἰτοῦσα . . . αἰτεῖσθε); Jn. xvi. 24, 26 (οὐκ ἦτήσατε . . . αἰτεῖτε . . . ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι μου αἰτήσεσθε).

ἀκούει ἡμῶν] Cf. Jn. ix. 31, οἴδαμεν οτι ο θεὸς ἁμαρτωλῶν οὐκ ἀκούει, ἀλλ' ἐὰν τις θεοσεβὴς ἦ . . . τούτου ἀκούει: Jn. xi. 41 f.; Ps. xvi. (xvii.) 6. The word naturally includes the idea of hearing favourably.

15. ἐὰν οἴδαμεν] For the indicative after ἐὰν, cf. 1 Th. iii. 8, ἐὰν στήκητε, and J. H. Moulton's Grammar of N.T. Greek, p. 168, where among others the following instances from papyri are quoted, ἐὰν δεί, ἐὰν οἶδεν, ἐὰν δ' εἰσίν, ἐὰν φαίνεται.

Our consciousness that we are heard in whatsoever we ask, the necessary condition not being repeated, brings with it a consciousness of possession. In the certainty of anticipation there is a kind of possession of that which has been granted, though our actual entering upon possession may be indefinitely delayed. God has heard the petition: the things asked for, for which we have asked not without effect (ἡτήκαμεν), are in a sense already ours. This is perhaps the most natural explanation of the verse.

But it is possible that the writer, while meditating after his wont on the subject of prayer, is trying to find expression for a view of prayer which gives a more literal meaning to the words ἔχομεν τὰ αἰτήματα. In the preceding verse he has laid stress on the fact that what he has to say applies only to such prayers as are offered κατὰ τὸ θέλημα αὐτοῦ. This excludes any prayer which is the expression of the supplicant's own wish on any subject, except in so far as it is identical with the will of God on that subject. He may therefore have thought of true prayer as including only requests for knowledge of, and acquiescence in, the will of God in the matter with which the prayer is concerned, rather than as a statement of the supplicant's wish, accompanied by a readiness to give it up, if it is in opposition to God's will. In the case of such prayers the supplicant can enter into immediate and conscious possession of the thing asked for, whether the answer to his own formulated or felt wish be yes or no. The statement may be literally true ὅτι τὰ αἰτήματα ἐξωμεν. Cf. Mk. xi. 24.

αἰτήματα] Here only in the Johannine writings. Cf. Lk. xxiii. 24, ἐπέκρινεν γενέσθαι τὸ αἰτήμα αὐτῶν: Ph. iv. 6, τὰ αἰτήματα ἥμων γνωριζέσθω πρὸς τὸν θεόν.

ητήκαμεν] The voice and tense emphasize the objective fact and its results.

ἀπ' αὐτοῦ] The Received Text has altered this into the commoner παρ' αὐτοῦ. Cf., however, 1 Jn. i, 5, ii. 20, 27, iv. 21; 3 Jn 7. In the Gospel παρά is the commoner usage in similar contexts. Thus the reading of Ν, Β is truer to the style of the Epistle, while the usage of the Gospel has apparently influenced the later text.

Intercession naturally finds its most obvious sphere in the new society itself. The writer therefore goes on to state its possibilities and its limitations. If any member of the body sees that his brother is committing sin, so long as it be not of such a character as must inevitably lead to final separation from the life of God, it goes without saying that he will exercise his power of intercession for him. And such is the power of intercession that he will be able to gain for him life, in every case where the sin is of the character described. There is such a thing as sin unto death, which tends to final separation from God, and which if persisted in must inevitably lead to that result. It is not clear that in such a case appeal can be made to the Common Father on behalf of a fellow-Christian. For such an one it may be that prayer can only be offered as for one who has forfeited his Christian privileges. But all injustice, every failure to maintain in our action right relations with God or with man, is sin. There is sin which is not of the fatal and final character described above. So there is plenty of scope left for the exercise of brotherly intercession.

ἀμαρτάνοντα ἁμαρτίαν] cf. Lk. v. 6, περί τῆς ἁμαρτίας αὐτοῦ ἦς ἡμαρτεν: Ezk. xviii. 24, ἐν ταῖς ἁμαρτίαις αὐτοῦ αἷς ἡμαρτεν. The accusative is added here because of the qualifying clause which succeeds (μὴ πρὸς θάνατον). It does not strengthen the verb.
The present participle, “sinning a sin” (RV.), perhaps indicates seeing the sinner ἐπαυτοφώρῳ.

ἐάν τις ἴδη] The subjunctive with ἐάν simply states the possibility.

μὴ πρὸς θάνατον] The μὴ is naturally used after ἐάν; it can hardly be pressed to make the judgment subjective, that of the τις.

αἰτήσει] The future is used either for the imperative, or because it is assumed as a matter of course that the brother will intercede for the brother.

δώσει] The subject of the verb may be either God, or the man who intercedes. The abrupt change of subject which the former view would require is perhaps decisive against it. And in virtue of his intercession and its power the Christian may be said to “give” life. Cf. Ja. v. 15, ἡ εὐχὴ τῆς πίστεως σώσει τὸν κάμνοντα, and (ver. 20) σώσει ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ ἐκ θανάτου.

ἔστιν ἁμαρτία πρὸς θάνατον] The phrase is probably suggested by the Old Testament conception of sins which lead to death (Nu. xv. 30, cf. 31). Deliberate and wilful transgression as opposed to sins committed unwittingly, were punished by the cutting off of the sinner “from among his people.” We may also compare Nu. xviii. 22, where it is said that after the setting apart of the Levites for the service of the Tabernacle, any of the people who came near to the Tabernacle of the Congregation would be guilty of sin and die, καὶ οὐ προσελεύσονται ἔτη οἱ υἱοὶ Ἰσραὴλ εἰς τὴν σκηνὴν τοῦ μαρτυρίου λαβεῖν ἁμαρτίαν θανατηφόρον, which is translated in the LXX, καὶ οὐ προσελεύσονται ἔτη οἱ νεκρῶν Ἰσραὴλ εἰς τὴν σκηνὴν τοῦ μαρτυρίου λαβεῖν ἁμαρτίαν θανατηφόρον, with which may be compared the Targum (Onk.) which is translated in the LXX, καὶ οὐ προσελεύσονται ἔτη οἱ νεκρῶν Ἰσραὴλ εἰς τὴν σκηνὴν τοῦ μαρτυρίου λαβεῖν ἁμαρτίαν θανατηφόρον, with which may be compared the Targum (Onk.). It is probable that in Rabbinic thought the words were taken closely together, though this is against the meaning and pointing of the Hebrew text. There may therefore be a direct connection between the verse and the words in Nu. xviii. 22. Cf. the note on ver. 17.

The form of expression would seem to indicate that the author is not thinking of one particular sin, definite though unnamed. “There is such a thing as sin which leads to death.” Such a state of sin may find expression in different acts. In the author’s view any sin which involves a deliberate rejection of the claims of the Christ may be described as “unto death.” If persisted in it must lead to final separation from the Divine life. Πρὸς θάνατον must, of course, denote a tendency in the direction of death, and not an attained result. The whole phrase thus suggests a “kind of sinning” (if the phrase may be allowed) rather than any definite act of sin, which leads inevitably in a certain direction. Its only possible issue, if it is persisted in, must be spiritual death. Deliberate rejection of Christ and His claims was probably most prominent in the writer’s thought. It is, of course, possible that in connection with what he has said in the earlier part of this chapter about the witness of the Spirit, he may have had in view the saying of the Lord recorded in Mk. iii. 29 (Mt. xii. 32; Lk. xii. 10). But nothing in this passage offers any clear proof of such a connection.

The writer does not forbid such intercession. He merely abstains from commanding it. Such cases lay outside the normal sphere of Christian intercession. They must be left to God alone. If the meaning often attributed to ἐρωτᾶν as distinguished from αἰτεῖν, “the request which is based upon fellowship, upon a likeness of position,” is to be pressed, the words contain their own justification. Prayer of “brother for brother, as such, addressed to the Common Father,” is out of the question where brotherhood has been practically renounced. But this interpretation, which emphasizes not that which the petitioner has in common with him to whom he makes his request, but rather with those on whose behalf he prays, is very doubtful. And the distinction itself between αἰτεῖν, the seeking of the inferior from the superior, and ἐρωτᾶν, which is said to imply a certain equality or familiarity between the parties (see Trench, Synonyms, § xl.), is far from being certainly established. The distinction drawn by Dr. Ezra Abbott between αἰτεῖν, “to ask for something to be given (not done), the emphasis being on the thing asked,” and ἐρωτᾶν, “to request a person to do (rarely give) something, the emphasis being thus on the person requested,” is perhaps more naturally applicable here. We may hesitate to entreat God to act on behalf of one who has practically renounced his allegiance. But the difference in meaning and usage between αἰτεῖν and ἐρωτᾶν is not very clear. And the evidence of the papyri, while it shows clearly that ἐρωτᾶν was the natural word to use in invitations, and to that extent supports the former of the two distinctions which have been maintained, does not help much in settling the question.
17. πᾶσα ἀδικία] Unrighteousness is one manifestation of sin, just as lawlessness is another. The most natural interpretation of the verse is that which sees in it a statement of the wide scope which exists for the exercise of Christian intercession, in spite of certain necessary limitations of its sphere. Windisch suggests that the difficulty might be removed by placing ver. 17 before 16c (ἐστιν ἀμαρτία πρὸς θάνατον).

καὶ ἐστιν ἁμαρτία οὐ πρὸς θάνατον] The fact is stated objectively (οὐ). The distinction between sins "unto death" and "not unto death" is illustrated by Schöttgen from Rabbinic writers. His first quotation, however, from Yoma 50. 1, is not convincing (δια τὴς ἁμαρτίας τοῦ ἱεροῦ), as it seems to refer to the animal offered or set apart as a sin-offering (see Goldschmid). The expression in Sota 48. 1, ἡ ἁμαρτία οὐ πρὸς θάνατον, offers a more satisfactory parallel.

18. οἴδαμεν] Cf. iii. 2, 14. The knowledge is intuitive. That which is stated follows immediately from the very nature of God, and of the life which He has given to men.

ὁ γεγεννημένος «.1.»] Cf. iii. 9. The perfect expresses the abiding results of the "begetting." In so far as they are realized they exclude the possibility of sin. Following his usual custom, the writer states the truth absolutely, without stating the modifications which become necessary as it is applied to individual cases in actual experience. The preceding section as well as the early part of the Epistle sufficiently shows that he recognized the actual fact of sin in Christians.

If the reading ἑαυτόν be adopted, the meaning must be that he who has once for all experienced the new birth keeps himself from the evil in virtue of the power which the new birth places within his reach. In the first clause of the verse the permanent consequences of the initial act are emphasized; here the stress is laid on the act itself. The fact of the new birth enables him to keep himself free from the attacks of the evil one. This sense is not badly expressed in the paraphrase of the Vulgate, "sed generatio Dei conseruat eum," a rendering which may have been influenced by the similar passage in iii. 9, ἡ γέννησις ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἁμαρτίαν οὐ ποιεῖ, ὅτι σπέρμα αὐτοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ μένει. It is found in Greek (ἡ γέννησις) in two cursive的手。 has strong claims to be regarded as original. It is difficult to see why ἑαυτόν should ever have been altered into αὐτόν, which is apparently far more difficult, unless, indeed, the change was due to accidental carelessness at a very early stage in the transmission of the text. And the evidence of the Latin, supported as it now is by two Greek cursives, is of considerable importance in favour of this reading (generatio Dei conservat eum vg., cf. nativitas Dei custodit illum Chromatius).

If αὐτόν is original, it can hardly be explained, as Weiss suggests, by referring the phrase ὁ γεννηθεὶς ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ "directly to the fact of the begetting from God, which keeps him who has experienced it." This would be a very strained expedient. It is still more unnatural to refer αὐτόν to God, as Karl does (Der aus Gott gezeugte hält ihn (seine Gebote). Τηρεῖ αὐτόν cannot mean "observes His commandments." With an accusative of the person τηρεῖ always has the sense in the N.T. of watching or guarding, in a friendly or hostile spirit. It would be far better to read αὑτόν (cf. Jn. ii. 24, οὐκ ἐπιστευειν αὐτόν).

But no explanation of the change from the perfect to the aorist participle is altogether satisfactory, if both are referred to the same person, i.e. the man who has experienced the new birth. The interpretation, therefore, which refers ὁ γεννηθεὶς ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ to Christ deserves serious consideration. It is true that the expression γεννηθῆναι ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ is not used elsewhere in the Johannine writings of Christ, unless the Western variant in Jn. i. 13, διό ... ἐκ θεοῦ ἐγεννήθη, for which there is interesting Patristic evidence in the second century, is to be regarded as original. We may also compare Jn. xv. 37, ἐγὼ εἰς τὸ ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ γεννηθηματι καὶ εἰς τοῦτο ἐλήλυθα εἰς τὸν κόσμον, and the language of the Messianic Psalm, ἐγὼ σήμερον γεγέννηκα σε, which has some claim to represent the true text in Lk. iii. 22. Thus interpreted the passage has a fairly close parallel in Jn. xvii. 15, ἵνα τηρήσῃς αὐτῶν ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ, and ver. 12, ἐγὼ ἐτήσιον αὐτῶς ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ σου ὥ τι δεδωκάς μοι καὶ ἐφύλαξα καὶ οὐδεὶς ἐξ αὐτῶν ἀπέλευσε. Cf. Αρσ. iii. 10, καὶ γὰρ σε τηρήσω εἰς τῆς ὥρας τοῦ πειρασμοῦ.

It may be noticed that τηρεῖν is never used in the Johannine writings with the accusative of the reflex pronoun, or in the N.T. with such an accusative absolutely. Cf. 2 Co. xi. 9, ἀβαρῆ ἐμαυτὸν ἐτήρησα: 1 Ti. v. 22, σεαυτόν ἁγνὸν τηρεῖ: Χα. i. 27, ἀσπίδαν ἐαυτόν τηρεῖν: Κα. 21, ἐαυτοὶς ἐν ἁγάπῃ θεοῦ τηρήσατε. An interesting article in support of the reference to Christ was contributed by Wohlenberg to the Neue Kirchliche Zeitung in 1902 (p. 233 ff.).

ἀπτεταί] The word probably suggests the idea of laying hold of in order to harm. Cf. Gn. xxvi 11; Jos. ix. 25 (19); Jer. iv.
150 THE EPISTLES OF S. JOHN [v. 18-20.

18. οἴδαμεν] Cf. the notes on ver. 18. What has been stated generally (πᾶς ὁ γεγεννημένος κ.τ.λ.) is now applied to the readers themselves, with whom the writer identifies himself (οἴδαμεν).

Εἶναι ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ denotes, as elsewhere in the Johannine writings, the state which is the consequence of the γεγεννῆται ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ. Cf. Jn. viii. 47; 1 Jn. iv. 4-6.

καί The clause is probably to be regarded as added independently, and not as subordinate to the ὅτι.

ὁ κόσμος ὅλος] The world as a whole, in its entirety, if the expression is to be distinguished from ὅλου τοῦ κόσμου (i. 2), “the whole world.”

ἐν τῷ πονηρῷ] The preceding ὁ πονηρός determines that this is masculine and not neuter, as Rothe suggests. For the construction, cf. Soph. O. C. 247, ἐν ὑμῖν ὡς θεῷ κείμεθα ταλάμοι. Christians are conscious, immediately and intuitively, of the difference between the power which dominates their life and that which controls absolutely the life, intellectual and moral, of the world, i.e. of the world of men so far as they remain estranged from God.

20. ἥκει] Cf. Jn. viii. 42, ἐξῆλθον καὶ ἥκω. The Christ, the Son of God, has fulfilled His mission. He has done the work which is characterized by His name, and the effects of it are with us still.

διάνοιαν] Cf. Eph. iv. 18, ἐσκοτισμένοι τῇ διανοίᾳ (in Eph. i. 18, quoted by Holtzmann, the true text has καρδίας not διανοίας), 1 P. i. 13, τὰς δοξάς τῆς διανοίας ψυχῶν: Pr. ii. 10, ἐλθεὶ ἡ σοφία εἰς τὴν διάνοιαν. The word is not found elsewhere in the Johannine writings. The faculty of knowing, or discerning, seems to be what it expresses. It is worth noting that γνώση also is absent from the Johannine writings, and νοῦς occurs only twice (Rev. xiii. 18, xvii. 9).

ίνα γινώσκομεν] The indicative, or at least the short ο, is well supported here, as in Jn. xvii. 3; ινα γινώσκονσι receives considerable support (A D G L Y Δ Δ 33), and in that case the form can hardly be regarded as a “corrupt pronunciation” of the subjunctive. For ινα with the future indicative, cf. Mk. xv. 20, ινα σταυρώσουσιν (v.l.): Lk. xiv. 10, ἵνα . . . ἐρεῖ σοι: xx. 10, ἵνα ... δώσουσιν αὐτῷ: Jn. vii. 3, ἵνα καὶ οἱ μαθηταί σου βεβαιωθοῦσιν: xvii. 2, ἵνα . . . δώσει (v.l.) αὐτοῖς: Ac. v. 15, ἵνα . . . ἐπισκυνάει (v.l.): xxi. 24, ἵνα ἐφεύρηκενται: i Co. ix. 18, ἵνα . . . θησίω: (?) ix. 21, ἵνα κερδανον: xiii. 3, ἵνα καυθήσομαι (v.l.): Gal. ii. 4, ἵνα ἡμᾶς καταδυσάωσιν: i P. iii. 1, ἵνα . . . ἀνέν λόγου κερδανονται: ἀρσ. iii. 9, ἵνα ἄνευ λόγου κερδανονται: vi. 4, ἵνα ἀλλήλους σφαξίζουσιν: vi. 11, ἵνα ἀναπαύσονται (v.l.): viii. 3, ἵνα δώσει: ix. 5, ἵνα βεβαιωθήσονται: xiii. 12, ἵνα προσκυνήσουσιν: xiv. 13, ἵνα ἀναπαύσονται: xii. 14, ἵνα έσται: ix. 4, ἵνα μὴ διώκονται: i x. 20, ἵνα μὴ προσκυνήσουσι. For its use with the present indicative the evidence is less clear, as in most cases there are variant readings. Cf. (besides Jn. xvi. 3) Jn. iv. 15, ἵνα . . . μηδὲ διέρχομαι (v.l.): v. 20, ἵνα υμεῖς θαυμάζετε (v.2.): Gal. iv. 17, ἵνα αὐτοὺς ζηλοῦτε: Tit. ii. 4, ἵνα σωφρονίζουσιν (v.l.): Apos. xxi. 6, ἵνα ἐκεὶ τρέφοντις αὐτὴν (v.l.): Gal. vi. 12, ἵνα μὴ διώκονται (v.l.): Apos. xiii. 17, ἵνα μὴ διώκονται (v.l.); in 2 P. i. θαν νοικίζεται ἵνα διὰ τῶν καλῶν ὑμῶν ἐργῶν βεβαιαν μη μὴ τὴν κλήσιν καὶ ἐκλογήν ποιεῖτε. The same uncertainty is found in sub-Apostolic writers. Preuschen quotes Barn. vi. 5; Ign. Eph. iv. 2; Tr. viii. 2 (Handwörterbuch, p. 530). On the whole, the evidence seems to point to traces of the occasional use of a vulgarism subsequently corrected. There is much to be said for Professor Deissmann’s view, that the Fourth Gospel is “ein echtes Volksbuch” (Beiträge zur Weiterentwicklung der Religion, p. 131).

וּ\n
The same uncertainty is found in sub-Apostolic writers. Preuschen quotes Barn. vi. 5; Ign. Eph. iv. 2; Tr. viii. 2 (Handwörterbuch, p. 530). On the whole, the evidence seems to point to traces of the occasional use of a vulgarism subsequently corrected. There is much to be said for Professor Deissmann’s view, that the Fourth Gospel is “ein echtes Volksbuch” (Beiträge zur Weiterentwicklung der Religion, p. 131).

The God who “fulfils the highest conception” of Godhead can only be known through the faculty of discernment given to men by His own Son, by means of His historic appearance on earth. The writer is already mentally contrasting the true with the false conceptions of God against which he warns his readers in the last verse of the Epistle.

The God who “fulfils the highest conception” of Godhead can only be known through the faculty of discernment given to men by His own Son, by means of His historic appearance on earth. The writer is already mentally contrasting the true with the false conceptions of God against which he warns his readers in the last verse of the Epistle.
ἀληθινῷ with reference to God. This interpretation is supported by the following clause. To interpret the words ἐν τῷ υἱῷ αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ as being in apposition to ἐν τῷ ἀληθινῷ, appended in order to leave no doubt as to the change of reference in τῷ ἀληθινῷ, is far less natural than to find in these words (ἐν τῷ υἱῷ αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ) a description of the method in which union with God is realized. The Thebaic (Sahidic) version has “in the Life” for ἐν τῷ ἀληθινῷ: with which should be compared the reading of some MSS of the Bohairic (see the critical note).

ἐν τῷ υἱῷ αὐτοῦ Ἰ. Χ. The difficulty of regarding these words as being in apposition to ἐν τῷ ἀληθινῷ, added so as to make it clear who is meant by that phrase, has been already stated so far as it affects the meaning of ὃ ἀληθινός in this verse. The grammatical difficulty of such an explanation is also very great. Αὐτοῦ naturally refers to the immediately preceding τῷ ἀληθινῷ. To pass over the natural antecedent and make it refer to τὸν ἀληθινὸν, which is not even the subject of the principal sentence, is extremely harsh.

Interpreted naturally, the words supply a needed explanation. It is in virtue of their relation to Christ, and their fellowship with Him, that Christians realize their fellowship with God. Cf. I Jn. 1. 3, καὶ ἡ κοινωνία δε ἡ ἡμετέρα μετὰ τοῦ πατρὸς καὶ μετὰ τοῦ νεόν αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. If the Christ of S. John says (vi. 44), οὐδεὶς δύναται ἐλθεῖν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα εἰ μὴ ὃ πατὴρ ὁ πέμψας τὸν ἐλκύσῃ αὐτόν, He also says (xiv. 6), οὐδεὶς ἔρχεται πρὸς τὸν πατέρα εἰ μὴ οὗτος ἐμοῦ.

οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ ἀληθινὸς θεός] If τῷ ἀληθινῷ be taken as referring to Christ, these words must also refer to Him. And in earlier times they were usually so interpreted. But it is hardly true to say that this interpretation is logically an absolute necessity (Weiss). It might, no doubt, be mere tautology to say of the ἀληθινὸς that He is ὁ ἀληθινὸς θεός. But οὗτος in the Gospel and Epistles is not used merely to avoid the repetition of a name. It seems often to refer to the previous subject, as previously described. Here God has been described as truly made known in Jesus Christ. The God who completely fulfils the highest conception of Godhead is the God who has been revealed in Jesus Christ, as contrasted with all false conceptions of God, against which the readers are warned in the next verse. For this use of οὗτος, cf. Jn. i. 2, οὗτος ἦν ἐν ἀρχῇ πρὸς τὸν θεόν, the Logos who can be described as θεός; i. 7, οὗτος ἦλθεν εἰς μαρτυρίαν, the man sent contrasted with the Divine Logos; i. 33, οὗτος ἦστιν ὁ βαπτιστής, He on whom the Spirit descended and remained; iii. 2, οὗτος ἦλθεν πρὸς αὐτόν, the ruler of the Jews; iv. 47, the βασιλικὸς whose son was sick; i Jn. ii. 22, οὗτος ἐστιν ὁ ἀντιχριστός, he who denies that Jesus is the Christ; v. 6, οὗτος ἐστιν ὁ ἐλθὼν, Jesus the Son of God; 2 Jn. 7, οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ πλάνος καὶ ὁ ἀντίχριστος, the representative of the class of deceivers who deny "Jesus Christ coming in flesh."

καὶ [ὡή αἰώνιος] This addition has often been held to render the reference of οὗτος to Christ necessary, it being regarded as not accidental that in the Gospel it is only of Christ that it is said that He is life (xi. 25, xiv. 6). But the language of Jn. v. 26, ὁ πατὴρ ἔχει ζωὴν ἐν ἑαυτῷ, justifies the expression here used if it refers to God. He is in the Johannine writings represented as the true source of spiritual life, which He has imparted to men in His Son. The writer would remind his readers that in spite of the claims to higher knowledge put forward by some, it remains true that he who hath not the Son hath not the Father. The God whom Jesus Christ reveals is the true source of life.

Holtzmann aptly quotes 2 Jn. 7 as proof that in the Johannine writings οὗτος may refer to the subject of the preceding sentence rather than to the name which has immediately preceded (πολλοὶ πλάνοι... οἱ μὴ ὁμολογοῦντις Ἰ. Χ. ἐρχόμενον ἐν σαρκί. οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ πλάνος καὶ ὁ ἀντίχριστος). The reference is naturally to the subject uppermost in the writer's thoughts, and the contents of the preceding verses introduced by the triple οἴδαμεν make this plain: τοῖς ὁ γεγεννημένοις ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ... ἐκ τοῦ ἀληθινοῦ. It is God—the true One—of whom we have been begotten—of whom we are—whom Jesus Christ came to make known—so that men could enter into fellowship with Him.
21. τεκνία] The writer’s favourite form of address to introduce an appeal.

φυλάξατε ἑαυτὰ] If the use of the active with the reflexive can be regarded as “emphasizing the duty of personal effort,” it is significant. The danger is great. It needs all the effort which they can make to guard against it. With the peremptory aorist imperative, cf. ἐξάρατε (1 Co. v. 13), and ἐκτινάξατε (Mk. vi. 11).

ἀπὸ τῶν εἰδώλων] All the false images of God which men have made for themselves instead of accepting the true revelation of Him given in His Son. The expression embraces all false conceptions of God. It is not exhausted by the particular conceptions of the (Gnostic) false teachers against whose views the Epistle is directed. And it is not probable that the writer intends only actual objects of pagan worship, as Zahn suggests, finding in the verse an indication of the character of the readers to whom the Epistle is addressed (cf. also Windisch, ad loc.). If any limited reference is necessary, it must be found in the untrue mental images fashioned by the false teachers.

SEPARATE NOTE.

The Text of 1 Jn. vii. 8.

μαρτυροῦντες] + ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ ο ὁ λόγος καὶ τὸ αγίον πνεῦμα καὶ οὐτοί τρεῖς ἐν εἰσὶ καὶ τρεῖς εἰσίν οἱ μαρτυροῦντες ἐν τῇ γῇ ἡ. It is not necessary now to prove at any great length the spuriousness of this interesting but unfortunate gloss. Its style and want of conformity to the context would be sufficient to condemn it, even if it had considerable support from trustworthy authorities for the text. Without it the passage runs clearly. The threefold witness is first given, which satisfies the requirements of the law; and after the witness which is legally valid among men, is given the “greater witness” of God, which is precisely defined in ver. 9, though the exact meaning of the words is doubtful. The “heavenly witnesses” destroy the natural sequence of the passage. And the personal use of ὁ λόγος is wholly alien to the style of the Epistle, and also of the Gospel, where it is confined to the Prologue. In the earliest form in which the words appear in Greek, the absence of articles and copulae, where Greek would require their presence, betrays at once their derivation from Latin.
It is enough to recapitulate the well-known and often stated facts that the words are not found (as part of the Johannine text) (1) in any Greek manuscript with the exception of two very late MSS, obviously modified by the text of the Latin Vulgate, and in the margin of a third, the marginal note being in a seventeenth century hand; (2) in any independent Greek writer; (3) in any Latin writer earlier than Priscillian; (4) in any ancient version except in the Latin, where it is absent from the older forms of the old Latin as found in Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine; from the Vulgate as issued by Jerome, according to the testimony of the Codices Amiatinus and Fuldensis; and from Alcuin's revision (Codex Vallicellianus). And even when it first appears in the Vulgate, in the “Theodulfian” recension, the earthly witnesses are placed before the heavenly.

The history of the gloss has been well told by Wettstein, Tischendorf, and Westcott, from whose work the accounts in most commentaries are obviously derived. New light has been thrown on the subject in the interesting monograph of Künstle, Das comma Joanneum auf seine Herkunft untersucht, 1905, and some interesting suggestions as to the origin of the celebrated “Codex Britannicus,” on the authority of which Erasmus in fulfilment of his rash promise introduced the clause into the text of his Third Edition, by Dr. Rendel Harris in his History of the Leicester Codex.

The history of the gloss itself naturally begins much earlier than the history of its introduction into the actual text of the Epistle.

The passage in Tertullian (adv. Praxeam, c. 25), which has often been quoted as containing an allusion to the verse, is really proof that he knew no such reading in the Epistle: “ita connexus patris in filio et filii in paracrito tres efficit cohaerentes, alterum ex altero, qui tres unum sunt, non unus, quomodo dictum est Ego et pater unum sumus, ad substantiae unitatem, non ad numeri singularitatem.”

Unfortunately there is no direct quotation of the passage in Cyprian: though the citation and interpretation of 1 Jn. v. 6–8 in the pseudo-Cyprianic tract, de rebaptismate, c. 15, witnesses to the early Latin text, which has no trace of the heavenly witnesses. “Et spiritus est qui testimonium perhibet, quia spiritus est ureritas: quia tres testimonium perhibent, spiritus et aqua et sanguis, et isti tres (in)\(^1\) unum sunt.”

The well-known passage in Cyprian, de Catholicae ecclesiae unitate, c. 6, shows how easily the language of 1 Jn. v. 8 was interpreted of the Three Persons of the Trinity: “dicit Dominus Ego et pater unum sumus et iterum de Patre et Filio et Spiritu
\(^1\) See von Soden, Das Lat. N.T. in Afrika, p. 280.
sancto scriptum est Et tres unum sunt.” In favour of this, which is the natural interpretation of Cyprian’s words, is the reference to him in Facundus, pro defensione trium capit. i. 3, who, after giving the same interpretation of the Spirit and the water and the blood, adds, “Quod tamen Ioannis apostoli testimonium b. Cyprianus, Carthaginiensis antistes et martyr, in epistola siue libro quem de unitate sanctae ecclesiae scriptis, de patre et filio et spiritu sancto sancto dictum intelligit.”

Augustine’s interesting interpretation (Contra Maximinum, ii. 22) of 1 Jn. v. 8, which he quotes in the form “Tres sunt testes, spiritus et aqua et sanguis et tres unum sunt,” shows that this interpretation was traditional in his time, so that he can assume that the writer of the Epistle intended the “unum” to refer to the three persons symbolized by the Spirit, water, and blood, and not to the symbols, which are different in substance. Incidentally it shows also, of course, that the heavenly witnesses formed no part of his text.

It may be worth while to quote from Berger’s Histoire de la Vulgate the evidence from the passage which he has there collected.

Leon Palimpsest (vii.):

et sps est testi

monium quia sps est veritas quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra sps et aqua et sanguis et tres sunt qui testimonium aicunt in caelo pa ter et verbum et sps scs et hi tres unum sunt in xpo ihu si testimonium hominum accip . . .

Compl.1 (Madrid Univ. Lib. 31) ix. “Quia tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terris, aqua sanguis et caro (mg. uel spiritus) et tria hec unum sunt et tria sunt qui testimonium dicunt in celo Pater Verbum et Spiritus et hec tria unum sunt in Christo Ihesu.”

Leg.1 (Cathedral of Leon, 6) x. “Quia tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra Spiritus et aqua et sanguis et tria haec unum sunt et tria sunt sunt qui testimonium dicunt in caelo Pater Verbum et Spiritus et hii tres unum sunt in Christo Ihesu.”

1 The words and letters in italics are conjecturally supplied by the Editor, being illegible in the MS.
NOTES ON I JOHN

"Quia¹ tres sunt qui testimonium dant² in terra Spiritus et³ aqua et sanguis et hi⁴ tres unum sunt in Christo Ihesu."⁵

Et⁶ tres sunt⁷ qui testimonium dicunt⁸ in caelo Pater ʻverbum et⁹ Spiritus¹⁰ et hii tres unum sunt.

Berne University Lib. A. 9, Saec. xi. (Vienne au Dauphiné): "Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant ¹ spiritus aqua et sanguis et tres unum sunt."

¹+ in terra sec. man. ²+ et tres sunt qui testimonium dicunt in caelo Pater et Filius et Spiritus Sanctus et hii tres unum sunt sec. man.

Paris B.N. 4 and 4², ix. and x. (given by Chapter of Puy to Colbert in 1681) addition in nearly contemporary hand to 1 Jn. v. 7: "Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in caelo Pater Verbum et Spiritus et tres unum sunt: et tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra sanguis aqua et caro. Si testimonium," etc.

B.N. 315, xii.-xiii.: "Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra caro aqua et sanguis: et tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra Pater Verbum et S.S. et hi tres unum sunt."

B.N. 13174, ix. (fin.): "Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant spiritus aqua et sanguis et tres unum sunt."

A second hand, almost contemporary, adds: "Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra Spiritus aqua et sanguis et tres unum sunt et tres sunt qui testimonium dicunt in caelo Pater Verbum et Spiritus sanctum et hi tres unum sunt."

This (M. Berger adds) is substantially the text of the first hand of Bible of Theodulf.

B.N. 11532 (Lothaire II. A.D. 855-869), from Corbie: "Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant¹ spiritus aqua et sanguis et tres unum sunt et tres sunt qui . . . ² testificantur³ Pater verbum et spiritus et tres unum sunt."

¹+ in terra sec. man. ² de caelo p. m. sup. ras. ³ testimonium dicunt in caelo sec. man.

Vienna Bibl. Imp. 1190, ix. (inc.). First hand gives ver. 8 without interpolation. In a second nearly contemporary hand is added, "Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium perhibent in terra aqua sanguis et caro et tres in nobis sunt et tres sunt qui testimonium perhibent in caelo Pater Verbum et spiritus et hi tres unum sunt."
With this may be compared the reading found in Bibl. Mazarine 7: "Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in caelo Pater Verbum et Spiritus et tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra caro sanguis et aqua et hi tres in nobis unum sunt."

With these must be compared the quotation in the treatise "Contra Varimadum" attributed by Chifflet in his edition of 1664 to Vigilius of Thapsus, and claimed by Künstle for the Spaniard Idacius Clarus (cf. Künstle, p. 16; Herzog-Hauck, 20. 642, s.v. Vigilius von Thapsus), which is almost identical with the reading of the second hand of the Vienna MS.

S. Gall. 907. In the hand of "Winitharius." viii.: "Quia tres sunt qui testimonium dant spiritus et aqua et sanguis et tres unum sunt: sicut in celo tres sunt Pater Verbum et Spiritus et tres unum sunt."

S. Gall. 83. Part of the MSS of Hartmut (841-872): "Quia tres sunt qui testimonium dant spiritus et aqua et sanguis et tres unum sunt: sicut in caelo tres sunt Pater Verbum et Spiritus et tres unum sunt."

Genève i. (x.—xi.), given to the Chapter of S. Peter by the Bishop Frederic (1031-1073). Representing an Italian text (Berger, 140 ff.): "Quia tres sunt qui testimonium dant spiritus et aqua et sanguis et tres unum sunt: et tres testimonium perhibent in caelo Pater Verbum et Spiritus et tres unum sunt."

Theodulfian recension (B.N. 9380) ix.: "Quia tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra spiritus aqua et sanguis et tres unum sunt et tres sunt qui testimonium dicunt in celo Pater et Filius et Spiritus sanctus et hi tres unum sunt."

The earliest certain instance of the gloss being quoted as part of the actual text of the Epistle is in the Liber Apologeticus (? A.D. 380) of Priscillian (ed. Schepps. Vienna Corpus xviii., 1889): "Sicut Ioannes ait: Tria sunt quae testimonium dicunt in terra: aqua caro et sanguis; et haec tria in unum sunt. et tria sunt quae testimonium dicunt in caelo: pater, uerbum et spiritus; et haec tria unum sunt in Christo Jesu." With this must be compared the readings of the Leon Palimpsest, Compl.¹, Leg.¹, all of which agree, if Berger has rightly restored the text of the Palimpsest, in connecting the words in Christo Jesu with the heavenly witnesses, placed, of course, after the earthly witnesses. The two latter MSS give some support to the peculiarities of Priscillian's text, the use of the neuter (τριά) and the substitution of caro for spiritus.

The evidence of the Expositio Fidei, published by Caspari from the Ambrosian MS (i. 101 sup.) which contained the Muratorian fragment, is also important: "Sicut evangelista testatur quia scriptum est, 'Tres sunt qui dicunt testimonium in caelo pater uerbum et spiritus': et haec tria unum sunt in Christo Iesu. Non tamen dixit 'Unus est in Christo Iesu.'"

The close agreement of this with Priscillian’s quotation is evident. Unfortunately, the value of its evidence is difficult to determine. Caspari, its editor, regards the creed as African, of the fifth or sixth century. Dom Morin would attribute it to Isaac the Jew and the times of Damasus (372). Küntstle regards it as clearly anti-Priscillianist and Spanish. If Dom Morin is right, its early date gives it a special importance. But the view that Priscillian is attacked in it is a satisfactory explanation of that part of it which is concerned with the Comma Joanneum.

It may, however, be doubted whether later authorities do not preserve an earlier form of the interpolation. The date of the so-called Speculum is uncertain. Probably it is not later than the first half of the fifth century. Küntstle brings forward some indications of its connection with Spain and the orthodox opponents of Priscillian. The form in which it quotes our passage is of considerable interest. It occurs in c. ii., of which the heading is De distinctione personarum patris et filii et spiritus sancti, and runs as follows:1 "Quoniam (quia C) tres sunt qui testimonium dicunt in terra, spiritus aqua et sanguis: et hii tres unum sunt in Christo Iesu, et tres sunt qui testimonium dicunt in caelo, pater, uerbum et spiritus: et hii tres unum sunt."

The agreement of this with the group of MSS quoted above from Berger is at once evident. Their common source cannot be of recent date. And intrinsically their reading has the appearance of being, if not original, at least earlier than the Priscillian form. The words in Christo Iesu are far more natural in connection with the earthly witnesses than at the end of the second clause.2 The form of text found in the Leon palimpsest, where there is no clause "et hii tres unum sunt" after the earthly witnesses, suggests how the connection of the phrases "hi tres unum sunt in Christo Iesu," if originally referring to the earthly witnesses, might have become attached to the second verse (heavenly witnesses) by the mechanical process of the insertion of a marginal gloss, originally containing an interpretation, after the word sanguis. The form in which Priscillian quotes the verses suited admirably his peculiar view as to the distinction of persons in the Trinity. If the Speculum is anti-Priscillianist, it is far more probable that the common use of the clause about the heavenly witnesses as part of the text of S. John’s Epistle is to be explained by the supposition that it had already found its way into some copies of the Epistles at an earlier date, than that Priscillian is first responsible for its insertion, while his opponents accepted his text and used it against him by means of a different interpretation, and, perhaps, a slight alteration.

1 De divinis Scripturis suis Speculum, ed. Weihrich, Vienna Corpus xii.
2 There is possibly support for the addition "in Christo Iesu" to the clause about the unity of the earthly witnesses in the Latin translation of Clement of Alexandria’s Adumbrationes on the Epistle. "Quia tres sunt qui testificantur Spiritus, quod est uita, et aqua, quod est regeneratio ac fides, et sanguis, quod est cognitio, ‘et his tres unum sunt.’ In Salvatore quippe istae sunt virtutes salutiferae, et uita ipsa in ipso filio eius existit." Even if this is so, we are uncertain how much to refer to Clement and how much to his abbreviator. Cf. Cassiodorus, Complexiones in Ioannis Epist. ad Parthis: "Cui rei testificantur in terra tria mysteria aqua sanguis et spiritus, quae in passione domini leguntur impleti; in caelo autem pater et filius et Spiritus sanctus; et hi tres unus est deus."

This point has been well discussed by M. Babut in his Priscillien et le Priscillianisme (Bibliotheque de l’École des hautes études, Sciences historiques et philologiques, 169, Paris, 1909), Appendix, iv. 3, p. 267 ff. He points out the great difficulties which met Künste’s suggestion that the insertion of the comma into the text of the Epistle is due to Priscillian himself: (1) His opponents never accuse him of having falsified the text of a Canonical Book. (2) To quote his own interpolation in his Apology would have been an inconceivable act of audacity. (3) Such a falsification could hardly have been accepted by all Catholic theologians, and, as Künste has shown, the reading was universally accepted in the ninth century. (4) The verse is found in several orthodox works of the fifth century. Its acceptance must therefore have been almost immediate by Priscillian’s enemies. It is far more probable that both Priscillian and his opponents found the gloss in the text of their Bibles.

The confession of faith presented by the Catholic bishops of Africa to the vandal king Hunnerich in 484 (Victor Vitensis, Historia Persecutionis, ed. Petschenig, Vienna Corpus, vii. 46 ff.), is proof of the presence of the insertion in the Johannine text towards the end of the fifth century: “Et ut adhuc luce clarius unius diuinitatis esse cum patre et filio spiritum sanctum doceamus, Ioannis evangelistae testimonio comprobatur; ait namque: Tres sunt qui testimonium perhibent (dant cod) in caelo pater uerbum et spiritus sanctus et hi tres unum sunt.”

Unfortunately the whole passage is not quoted, and therefore the quotation throws little light on the history of the gloss. Künste, again, claims a Spanish source for the whole confession. Whether he is justified in doing so or not must be left to the specialist to determine. The quotation has not the variant dicunt, supposed by Berger to be Spanish (p. 163).

It is certain that the gloss was accepted by Fulgentius of

---

1 M. Babut rejects Künste’s statement that Priscillian denied the distinction as too absolute. He adds, “mais il est vrai qu’il les distingue mal et qu’il tend, en plusieurs textes, à les fondre en une seule. On a raison de parler de panchristisme” (p. 273).
NOTES ON I JOHN

Ruspe († 533). Though the treatise De fide Catholica adv. Pintam is not recognized as his work, the quotations in his Responsio contra Arianos and De Trinitate determine the matter. Here, also, it is only the gloss which is quoted. We do not know the relation in which it stood to the rest of the passage in his text of the Epistle. It may be worth while to add the exact text, which differs in the two quotations. The variants in brackets are from the De Trinitate.

The evidence for the African use of the passage which has been supposed to be derived from Vigilius of Thapsus (490) is too uncertain to afford much help.

The quotation in the First Book de Trinitate (Migne, P. L. lxxii. 243), which is not by Vigilius, has an interesting text.

"Tres sunt qui testimonium dicunt in caelo pater uerbum et Spiritus et in Christo Iesu unum sunt."

The form of text contains Spanish affinities even if Künstle is not right in claiming a Spanish origin for the twelve books de Trinitate.

The quotation in the treatise c. Varimadum (c. 5, Migne, P. L. lxxii. 359) is still more interesting:

"Tres sunt qui testimonium perhibent in terra aqua sanguis et caro et tres in nobis sunt. Et tres sunt qui testimonium perhibent in caelo pater uerbum et Spiritus et ii tres unum sunt." Cf. Vienna B.I. 1190, Bibl. Mazarine. Here, again, the connection with Spanish types of text is far more certain than any possible connection with Africa or Vigilius.

The pseudo-Hieronymian prologue to the Catholic Epistles, which is found in the Codex Fuldensis (546), though that MS does not contain ver. 7 in its text of the Epistle, affords additional evidence of the prevalence of the gloss in the sixth and probably in the fifth century.

"Non ita est ordo apud Graecos qui integre sapiunt . . . illo praecipue loco, ubi de unitate trinitatis in prima Iohannis epistula positum legitimus, in qua ab infidelibus translatoribus multum erratum esse fidei uritate comperimus, trium tantummodo uocabula, hoc est aquae sanguinis et spiritus in ipsa sua editione ponentes, et patris ubique ac spiritus testimonium omittentes, in quo maxime et fides catholica roboratur et patris et filii et spiritus sancti una diuinitatis substantia comprobatur."

Künstle would again find a Spanish origin for this prologue, attributing it to Peregrinus, the orthodox sponsor of Priscillianist writings; but on what grounds he does not say.

1 See, however, Westcott, p. 194, who refers to C. Fabian. fragm.
The evidence of Ziegler's Freisingen fragment, now in the Staatsbibliothek at Munich, must be considered next. The passage runs as follows:

QM TR es sunt qui testificantur
IN TERRA · SPs ET AQUA ET SAnguis et tres sunt qui tes TIFICANTUR IN CAELO PaTER Et uerbum et sps ses et hi
TRES UNUM SUNT · SI TEST...

(The legible letters are given in capitals.)

If Ziegler is right in his identification of the text of this fragment with that of Fulgentius of Ruspe, we have again important evidence of the existence of the gloss in Africa at an early date. This is, however, already attested for the sixth century, and the fragment cannot be earlier than that. If the text of the quotation which has been given above for Fulgentius is correct, there are differences between his text and that of this fragment, at any rate in this passage. And M. Berger has pointed out the similarity between the text of the Leon Palimpsest and the Freisingen fragment in these verses (Histoire, p. 9). The closeness of similarity between the two texts is seen in the note which gives a comparison of their readings where the two can be tested. It will be seen that their agreement in readings certainly attested by both is very close indeed, and it is possible that a more accurate restoration of the illegible parts would reveal even closer resemblance.1 This agreement includes, in the 1 Leon Palimpsest.

ZIEGLER.

I JN. iv. 3-6.

in carne uenisse hic quod
4. eum is saeculo audit nos ex hoc

om. (reading qui non confitetur IHM) hoc quem eos his + est nos audit hinc.

V. 3-II, 12-16.

5. est quoniam + autem quia
6. aquam et spm om. et spm (no room)
8. testimonium dant testificantur (suits better)
9. quoniam testimonium dicunt testificantur sunt in xpo ihu
10. filio 2° om. in x. i. (certain) quiia in do
small space under consideration, the readings hoc (hic) est illius Antichristi (iv. 3), the priority of the earthly witnesses, as we should naturally expect in such early texts, the absence of the clause affirming the unity of the earthly witnesses. They differ in their translations of μαρτυρεῖν (unless, indeed, testificari should be supplied in the doubtful places of the Leon Palimpsest), and probably, with regard to the addition in Christo Iesu after unum sunt in ver. 8, which cannot be certainly claimed for the African text, unless the Speculum can be definitely connected with Africa. It would certainly be rash to assume an early African form of the text from which these words were absent as opposed to the early Spanish form which undoubtedly had them, and probably in this place. It is always possible that their absence from later texts may have affected the manuscript transmission of the text of early quotations. We are again brought to the conclusion that the relation between early African and Spanish texts needs further investigation.

The gloss was certainly known as part of the text of the Epistle in Africa in the fifth century. Its acceptance as part of the text cannot be proved in any country except Spain in the fourth century. There it was undoubtedly used by Priscillian (? 380). The influence of his work and writings on the Latin text of the Bible, which passed over into orthodox circles through Peregrinus and others, is an undoubted fact. It is through the Theodulfian Recension of the Vulgate that the gloss first gained anything like wide acceptance. A large proportion of the earlier evidence for the gloss can be very plausibly traced to Spanish influences. Thus the importance of the name of Priscillian in the history of the insertion is fully established. But Künstle has not proved his point that Priscillian was the first who introduced the words into the text of S. John’s Epistle, or even that this first took place in Spain. At least it may be said that the evidence of Spanish manuscripts, of the form in which the gloss is found in Priscillian, and of its use by his opponents, suggest the probability that Priscillian was not responsible for its first introduction. But these reasons are not conclusive. In one point Priscillian has preserved the true reading against (Ο) all Latin authorities, reading, with regard to the earthly witnesses, in unum sunt. It is a possible explanation of the textual facts that the words in Christo Iesu were first connected with the passage by Priscillian, either as part of the text or as an explanation. In the place which he assigns to them they support his “Panchristismus” admirably. Their first connection with

13. aeternam habetis
14. quodcunque
15. scimus
the earthly witnesses may be due to their removal by Peregrinus or some orthodox opponent of Priscillian to a place where they did not give such clear support to Priscillian's views.

At present we cannot say more than that the insertion was certainly known in Africa in the fifth century. The connection between the Spanish and African texts still requires investigation. Though its acceptance as part of the text of the Epistle cannot be proved for any locality except Spain in the fourth century, it does not necessarily follow that it is of Spanish origin.

In view of the clear evidence that Priscillian in 380 knew, or made the words part of his text, it is difficult to maintain an African origin for the gloss, which did not form part of the text of Augustine, who died A.D. 430. On this point Jülicher's interesting review of Künstle's work (Göttingen: Anzeigen, 1905, pp. 930–935) perhaps hardly does justice to the strength of Künstle's position, though it rightly calls attention to some inaccuracies in his quotations and defects in his methods of presenting the evidence. Ziegler's theory of the African origin of the gloss is now faced by great, if not insuperable, difficulties. But the subject needs further investigation by competent Latin scholars.

There is no trace of the presence of the gloss in any Oriental version or in Greek writers, except under the influence of the Vulgate.

The following note in Zohrab's edition of the Armenian Bible is of sufficient interest to deserve quotation in full. I am indebted for the translation to my friend and colleague Mr. N. McLean, Tutor and Lecturer of Christ's College, Cambridge. The note has been somewhat curtailed by paraphrase.

"Oscan here as in many other places altered the Armenian text from the Latin, adding, 'Who witnesses that Christ is the Truth. For there are three who witness in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, and the three are one: and there are three who witness on earth, Spirit, Water, and Blood, and the three are one. If of men,' etc. But of eighteen of our MSS, old and new, and two Catholic interpreters in addition, one only from the new, written in A.D. 1656, ten years before the edition of Oscan, thus puts the text 'That the Spirit is truth. There are the three who testify in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, and these three are one. And there are three who testify on earth, the Spirit, the Water, and the Blood. If of men,' etc. And although there was also another more ancient copy which contained a similar text, nevertheless it plainly appeared that the first writing had been erased, and the longer text adjusted to its space by another writer. All our MSS, whether of the whole Scriptures or of missals, as well as numerous Greek older copies, have only the text which we have been compelled to edit (i.e. the true text without the gloss)."

The close parallel to the history of the insertion of the gloss in the Greek text is of some interest.

According to Westcott, it first appears in Greek in a Greek version of the Acts of the Lateran Council in 1215. Its first appearance in a Greek MS of the N.T., the Graeco-Latin Vatican MS Ottobon. 162 (xv.), betrays the use of the Vulgate, ὅτι τρεῖς εἶσιν οἱ μαρτυροῦντες ἀπὸ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ πατὴρ λόγος καὶ πνεῦμα καὶ οἱ τρεῖς εἰσὶ τὸ ἐν εἰσὶν καὶ τρεῖς εἰσὶν οἱ μαρτυροῦντες ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ὕδωρ καὶ τὸ αἷμα. The Codex Britannicus (Dublin, Montfort 34, saec. xvi.) is even more slavish (ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ, οὗτοι οἱ τρεῖς, πνεῦμα ὕδωρ καὶ αἷμα). Erasmus fulfilled his promise to the letter in his third edition. He follows the MS that had been "provided" exactly, except that he inserts καί before ὕδωρ, and does not remove the clause καὶ οἱ τρεῖς εἰσὶ τὸ ἐν εἰσιν, which rightly had a place in his earlier editions.

The history of the Montfort Codex, which Dr. Dobbin pronounced to be "a transcript with arbitrary and fanciful variations" of the Oxford MS Lincoln 39, has been further investigated by Dr. Rendel Harris in his "Leicester Codex," 1889. Both MSS were at one time in the possession of the same owner, Chark. His reasons for suggesting that the MS was actually forged by a Franciscan of the name of Roy (or Froy), perhaps at the instigation of Henry Standish, provincial master of the order in England, will be found on pp. 46–53 of the "Leicester Codex." They are plausible, even if they do not compel assent. He has at least proved that the MS was in the hands of Franciscans at a date very near to that of its actual production.

Before the appearance of Erasmus's third edition in 1522 the gloss had already been printed in Greek in the Complutensian Polyglott in 1514. The text is obviously derived, if not taken immediately from the Vulgate, though the supply of the necessary articles and copulas to make the sentences Greek has partially concealed its close dependence upon the Latin.
NOTES ON 2 JOHN.

1-3. Introduction and salutation.

1. ὁ πρεσβύτερος] The use of πρεσβύτερος as a more or less official title in Asia Minor, the Islands, and Egypt has been discussed by Deissmann, Bibel Studien, 153 ff., NBS 60 ff. Cf. also H. Hauschildt, in Preuschen’s ZNTW, 1903, p. 235 ff., and Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, p. 25. Its use in Egypt as a title, and in connection with the Temples, as well as in other connections, is well established at an early date. The evidence of Papias and Irenaeus points to a prevalent Christian usage of the word, especially in Asia, to denote those who had companied with Apostles, and had perhaps been placed in office by them; who could, at any rate, bear trustworthy witness as to what Apostles taught. It is natural to suppose that throughout the fragment of his Introduction, which Eusebius quotes, Papias uses the expression πρεσβύτερος in the same sense. The elders are the men from whom he has himself well learnt and well remembered the illustrative matter for which he finds a place in his book beside his interpretations of the Lord’s words, or whose statements as to what the Apostles said he had learnt by inquiry whenever he met those who had companied with them. This interpretation is supported by the comments of Eusebius on the passage (H. E. iii. 39. 7), τοὺς τῶν ἀποστόλων λόγους παρὰ τῶν αὐτῶν παρηκολουθηκότων ὁμολογεῖ παρειληφέναι, i.e. he learnt from elders who had companied with Apostles the words of the Apostles, obtaining his information either directly from the elders themselves, or indirectly from those who had companied with the elders. Irenaeus uses similar language, adv. Haer. v. xxxiii. 3, “Quemadmodum presbyteri meminerunt qui Iohannem discipulum Domini uiderunt audisse se ab eo quemadmodum de temporibus illis docebat Dominus et dicebat”: iii. xxxvi. 1, ὁ δὲ πρεσβύτερος λέγουσιν Τὸτε καὶ ὁ μὲν καταξιωθέντες τῆς ἐν οὐρανῷ διατριβῆς ἐκεῖνε χωρήσουσιν. Any individual member of such a class might naturally be styled ὁ πρεσβύτερος, as Papias speaks of δ' πρεσβύτερος Ἰωάννης, or δ' πρεσβύτερος, and Eusebius (H. E. iii. 39. 14) of τοῦ πρεσβύτερου Ἰωάννου παραδόσεις. The absolute use of the phrase in Papias (καὶ τοῦθ᾽ δ' πρεσβύτερος ἔλεγε) and in 2 and 3 John makes it the distinctive title of some member of the circle to whom the words are addressed, or at least of one who is well known to them. The circle is in all three cases Asiatic. It is natural to suppose that Papias is referring to the John whom he elsewhere describes as John the Elder. And it is equally natural to see in the author of these two Epistles, who so describes himself, the Elder John whom Papias so carefully distinguishes from the Apostle. The usage of the word is most naturally explained if he is the last survivor of the group, though the possibility of other solutions is by no means excluded.

ἐκλεκτῇ κυρίᾳ] The interpretation of these words has been discussed generally in the Introduction. Those who have seen in this designation the name of an individual have explained it differently according as the first, or the second, or both words are regarded as proper names, or both are treated as descriptive adjectives, the actual name not being given. (i.) The view that Electa is a proper name is first found in Clement of Alexandria, “Scripta est ad Babyloniam quandam Electam nomine.” It is uncertain whether “Babyloniam” is due to some confusion with the First Epistle of S. Peter on the part of either Clement or his excerptor and translator, or whether it is a conclusion drawn from the title Πρὸς Πάρθους by which the First Epistle was known (cf. the title of Augustine’s Tractates). This view has been supported in recent years by Dr. J. Rendel Harris, who in an article in the Expositor (1901) to which reference has been made in the Introduction, collected several instances of the use of κύριος and κυρία by near relatives in letters contained in the Oxyrhynchus, and Fayum Papyri. Cf. Oxyrh. Pap. ii. 300 (p. 301), Ἰνδικὴ Θαεισοῦτι τῇ κυρίᾳ χαίρειν. He might have noticed a similar use of δέσποινα in one of the letters which he quotes (ἀσπάζομαι τὴν γλυκυτάτην μου θυγατέρα Μακκαρίαν καὶ τὴν δεσποίνην μου μητέραν υμῶν καὶ δλους τοὺς ἡμῶν κατ’ ὄνομα: cf. in the same letter, written by a father to his son, κἂν ὥς, δεσποτά μου, ἀντίγραψον μοι ἐν τάξει). His view that κύριος, κυρία are thus proved to have been used as titles of affection, has been justly criticized by Professor Ramsay in a subsequent article in the same periodical, who sees in it more naturally a title of courtesy. Perhaps it would be better to regard its use as rather playful, or not to be taken too seriously. But the evidence adduced in any case does not go far towards proving that 2 John is addressed to an individual. The usage of individual address would necessarily be followed by a writer who wishes to personify a community to whom he writes. And the language of ver. 15 (τῆς ἀδελφῆς σου τῆς ἐκλεκτῆς) is almost fatal to the supposition that Electa is here used as a proper name.

(ii) If the name is given at all it must be found in Kyria and not in Electa. Kyria as a proper name is found occasionally, and even in Asia Minor. Lücke quotes (p. 444) Corp. Inscr. Gruter. p. 1127, n. xi. Φένιππος καὶ ή γυνὴ αὐτοῦ Κυρία, and other instances. According to Holtzmann it is a common name for women, but he does not cite instances. Cf. Zahn, Introd. vol. iii., Eng. tr. p. 383, who refers to Sterrett, The Wolfe Expedition, pp. 138, 389. But on grammatical grounds this explanation is improbable. We should certainly expect the article with ἐκλεκτῇ. Cf. 3 Jn. i, Γαίῳ τῷ ἀγαπητῷ: Ro. xvi. 13, Ῥοῦφον τὸν ἐκλεκτὸν ἐν κυρίῳ: Philem. Φιλήμονι τῷ ἀγαπητῷ: Oxyrh. Pap. 117, Χαιρέας Διονυσίῳ τῷ κυρίῳ ἀδελφῷ: 119, Θέων Θέωνι τῷ πατρὶ χαίρειν. These passages illustrate the grammatical difficulty of assuming that Κυρία is a proper name. The anarthrous ἐκλεκτῇ makes it very improbable.

(iii.) The language of ver. 13, ἀσπάζεται σε τὰ τέκνα τῆς ἀδελφῆς σου τῆς ἐκλεκτῆς, makes it very unlikely that both words are to be regarded as proper names.

(iv.) The view, however, that an individual is addressed, has often been held by those who think that her name has not been recorded. As stated in the Introduction, the name of Mary the Mother of the Lord, and of Martha, have been suggested. The former suggestion was natural, if not inevitable, at an earlier date, in view of Jn. xix. 27 and the supposed residence of the Blessed Virgin in Asia, when the general historical setting of the Epistle was less carefully considered or understood than in recent times. A supposed play on the meaning of Martha was equally attractive to an earlier generation. No serious arguments can be brought forward in favour of either conjecture. If the theory of individual address is maintained, it is certainly better to assume that the name is not given. The combination of terms is a natural expression of Christian courtesy.

But the general character of the Epistle is almost decisive against the view that it is addressed to an individual. The subjects with which it deals are such as affect a community rather than an individual or a family, though much of its contents might be regarded as advice needed by the leading member of a Church on whom the duty mainly fell of entertaining the strangers who visited it. We must also notice (1) that the language of vv. 1–3, “Whom I and all who know the truth love because of the truth that abideth in us,” suits a community far better than an individual. This is also true of the language of the salutation in ver. 13 which has been already quoted. (2) The interchange of singular and plural points to the same conclusion, εὕρηκα ἐκ τῶν τέκνων σου (ver. 4), ἐρωτῶ σε (ver. 5), βλέπετε ἑαυτούς (ver. 8), εἴ τις ἔρχεται πρὸς ὑμᾶς (ver. 10), ὑμῖν (ver. 12), ἀσπάζεται σε (ver. 13). Mr. Gibbins in an interesting paper in the Expositor (series 6, 1902, p. 232) has drawn attention to the similar changes between singular and plural which are found in Is. liv., lv. and Bar. iv., v., where the City and her inhabitants are addressed under the image of a woman and her children. These parallels show clearly how natural was the transference of the prophetic language with regard to Jerusalem and its inhabitants to a Christian Church and its members.
1. NOTES ON 2 JOHN 169

(3) The language of ver. 5, ἐρωτῶ σε, κυρία, οὐχ ὡς ἐντολὴν γράφωσοι καίνην, ἀλλὰ ἂν εἴχαμεν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, ἵνα ἀγαπῶμεν ἀλλήλους, with its clear reference to the Lord's "new commandment" given to His disciples, suggests a Church and not an individual.

(4) The substance of what is said in vv. 6, 8, 10, 12 is clearly not addressed to children. The "children" of the "Elect Lady" must certainly have reached the age of manhood.

(5) The nearest parallel in the N.T. is to be found in 1 P. v. 13, ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτή, though we may hesitate to assume with Dom Chapman (ZS, 1904, pp. 357 ff., 517 ff.) that the reference in both cases is the same, the Church of Rome being addressed. We may perhaps also compare the language in which the Seer addresses the same Churches in the Apocalypse (i.—iii.).

The reference to the whole Church is already suggested by Clement, "significat autem electionem ecclesiae sanctae." Cf. also Jerome, Ep. 123. 12, Ad Ageruchiam, "Una ecclesia parens omnium Christianorum... praue haeretici in plures ecclesias lacerant... Una est columba mea, perfecta mea, una est matris suae, electa genetrici suae (Cant. vi. 8). Ad quam scribit idem Iohannes epistolam, Senior Electae dominae et filii eius," where the reference to the Church is clear, though he apparently regards Electa as a proper name.

The reference to a local Church is found in the Scholiast, ἐκλεκτὴν κυρίαν λέγει τὴν ἐν τινὶ τόπῳ ἐκκλησίαν. This explanation has been adopted by most modern commentators.

καὶ τοῖς τέκνοις αὐτῆς] Cf. Bar. iv. 30—32, θάρσει, Ἰερουσαλημ, παρακαλέσει σε ὑπὸ τὸν ὄνομας σέ. δείλαιοι οἱ σε κακώσαντες καὶ ἐπιχαρέστες τῇ σῇ πτώσει δείλαιαί αἱ πόλεις αἰς ἐδούλευσαν τὰ τέκνα σου, δείλαια ἡ δεξαμένη τοὺς νυφός σου. v. 5, ὁ ἰδιὸς σου συνηγμένα τὰ τέκνα ἀπὸ ἡλίου δυσμῶν... χαίροντας τῇ τοῦ θεοῦ μνείᾳ. Gal. iv. 25, δουλεύει μετὰ τῶν τέκνων αὐτῆς. The use of τέκνα, which emphasizes the idea of community of nature of those who have experienced the new spiritual birth, as contrasted with the Pauline νυφός, which often lays stress on the dignity of heirship, is characteristic of the author. But it is not always safe to press the distinction. The more general term, which includes the whole family, would in many cases naturally be preferred to υἱός, which, strictly speaking, applies only to sons.

οὗς ἐγὼ ἀγαπῶ] Cf. Gal. iv. 19, τέκνα (ο.ι. τεκνία) μον, οὗς πάλιν ὀδώρω. Arguments, in favour of the view that a Church is addressed, which are based on the use of the masculine relative are very precarious. In any case it would be the natural construction κατὰ σίνεσιν. For the use of ἐγὼ, cf. 3 Jn. 1. It may be characteristic of the writer's style. But the emphatic language of the rest of the verse suggests that the author is thinking of those who do not love, and love “in truth.”

ἐν ἀληθείᾳ] Cf. 3 Jn. 1, where the word is again anarthrous. The phrase is not “merely adverbial,” a periphrasis for “truly.” It suggests a love which is exercised in the highest sphere, which corresponds to the truest conception of love. Cf. περιπατεῖν ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, conduct in which everything is regulated by “truth.”

καὶ οὐκ ἐγὼ κ.τ.λ.] The unsuitability of this language, if addressed to the members of a single family, has already been pointed out. As addressed to members of a Church in which the Elder can confidently reckon on faithful support, while he is fully conscious of the existence of divisions and of strenuous opposition to himself and his teaching, they offer no difficulty and have their special significance.

τὴν ἀλήθειαν] Cf. 1 Jn. 3 (note). The truth, as revealed by the Christ, and gradually unfolded by the Spirit, who is “Truth.” It covers all spheres of life, and is not confined to the sphere of the intellect alone.

2. διὰ τὴν ἀλήθειαν] The possession of the “truth” as an abiding force which dominates the whole life calls out the love of all who share the possession.

ἐν ἡμῖν] The author includes the Church to whom he is writing, or at least its faithful members, in the numbers of those who “know the truth.”

καὶ μεθ’ ἡμῶν ἔσται] An expression of sure confidence rather than of a wish. The truth must always “abide” in the Society, though individual members may fall away. For the parenthetical construction, cf. 1 Jn. iii, 1, ἵνα τέκνα θεοῦ κληθῶμεν, καὶ ἐσμέν.

3. ἔσται μεθ’ ἡμῶν] The taking up of the language of the preceding verse is thoroughly in accord with the writer's habit. Compare the repetition of ἀλήθεια in the preceding verse. The wish expressed in ordinary salutations here "passes into assurance." Perhaps in view of their circumstances the need of assurance was specially felt by writer and recipients as well.

χάρις, ἔλεος, εἰρήνη] This exact form of salutation is found elsewhere in the Epistles to Timothy. It is a natural expansion of the commoner χάρις καὶ εἰρήνη which in some sense combines the Greek and Hebrew forms of salutation; and it fits in well with the general tone of later Epistles. Neither ἔλεος nor the cognate verb occurs elsewhere in the Johannine writings. Cf. Jude 2, ἔλεος υἱῶν καὶ εἰρήνη καὶ ἀγάπη πληθυνθείη: Polycarp, ad Phil. ἔλεος υἱῶν καὶ εἰρήνη, and the Letter of the Smyrneans, ἔλεος καὶ εἰρήνη καὶ ἀγάπη... πληθυνθείη.

παρὰ Ἰησοῦ κ.τ.λ.] The whole phrase brings into prominence the views on which the author throughout lays most stress—the Fatherhood of God, as revealed by one who being His Son can reveal the Father, and who as man (Ἰησοῦ) can make Him known to men. Cf. Jn. xx. 31, ἵνα πιστεύητε ὃ ἐστιν ὁ Χριστὸς ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ. The words used contain implicitly the author's creed.

ἐν ἀληθείᾳ καὶ ἀγάπῃ] The two vital elements of the Christian Faith, the possession of the highest knowledge and its expression in action. They are the keynotes of the Epistle.
we have here one of the instances, of which there are several in the N.T., which prove that in certain words the perfect is in this period beginning to lose its special force, though the process has not yet gone so far as is often maintained. Cf. Burton, N.T. Moods and Tenses, p. 44, who regards the usage as confined in the N.T. to a few forms, ἔσχηκα, εἴληφα, ἑώρακα, εἴρηκα, γένονα. To distinguish in this verse between the initial moment (ἐχάρην) and the ground of it which still continues is precarious.

A comparison of 3 Jn. 3 suggests that the information which caused his joy came to the Elder through travelling brethren who, perhaps from time to time (cf. περιπατοῦντας), brought him news of the sister Church. There is no suggestion of an earlier visit of his own to the Church to which he is now writing. In that case he would probably have used the aorist.

ἐκ τῶν τέκνων σου] He cannot praise the whole Church without distinction. All the members of the community had not remained faithful to the “truth.” If “many” had not themselves gone out into the world as deceivers (ver. 7), many had listened to the seductive teaching of such deceivers. It seems probable that even the majority had been led astray.

περιπατοῦντας ἐν ἀληθείᾳ] Cf. ver. 1, and 3 Jn. 4. The “truth” corresponds to perfection in every sphere of being.

cαθὼς ἐντολὴν ἐλάβομεν παρὰ τοῦ πατρός] Cf. Jn. x. 17 f. διὰ τοῦτο μὲ διὰ πατήρ ἀγαπᾶ ὅτι ἐγὼ τίθημι τὴν ψυχήν μου, ἵνα πάλιν λάβω αὐτήν. οὐδεὶς ἕρεν αὐτὴν ἀπ' ἐμοῦ, ἀλλ' ἐγὼ τίθημι αὐτὴν ἀπ' ἐμαυτοῦ. ἐξουσίαν ἔχω θεῖναι αὐτὴν, καὶ ἐξουσίαν ἔχω πάλιν λαβεῖν αὐτὴν. ταῦτα τῷ πατρῷ ἐλαβον παρὰ τοῦ πατρός μου. Cf. Jn. xii. 40; 1 Jn. iii. 23. The phrase ἐντολὴν λαβεῖν is used elsewhere in the N.T.; cf. Ac. xvii. 15; Col. iv. 10. Dom Chapman’s ingenious suggestion, that the meaning of this verse should be determined by the passage quoted from Jn. x., breaks down, as Prof. Bartlet has shown, on a point of grammar. The present participle (περιπατοῦντας) could not be used in such a sense. Men could hardly be said to continue in the exercise of the “remarkable virtue” of martyrdom. The command referred to here must be either the “new commandment” to love as Christ loved (cf. 1 Jn. iv. 21), which perhaps suits ver. 5 best, or the commandment to faith and love; cf. 1 Jn. iii. 23, καὶ αὐτῇ ἐστίν ἡ ἐντολὴ αὐτοῦ, ἵνα πιστεύσωμεν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ ἀγαπῶμεν ἀλλήλους, καθὼς ἔδωκεν ἐντολήν ἡμῖν. On the whole the latter suits the whole context better.
5. The adverb is temporal. Cf. ver. 4, ἐχάρην.

ἐρωτῶ σε Κυρία] If ἐρωτᾶν has the special force of suggesting some sort of equality of position between the two parties concerned ("in the exercise of the full privilege of Christian fellowship," Wsct.), the emphasis is laid on the words οὐχ ὡς ἐντολὴν. The Elder who has the right to command merely grounds a personal request, as between equals, on the old command laid on both alike by the Master. If, however, the special meaning of ἐρωτᾶν is to be found in the emphasis which it lays on the person addressed, as opposed to the thing asked (ἀλλὰ), then Κυρία is the emphatic word. He can ask in full confidence of the "Elect Lady" that which is no new command, pleading for the fulfilment of the old commandment laid on her and on all by the Lord. But ἐρωτᾶν was the natural word to use. Cf. Oxyrh. Pap. ii. 292, ἥρωτησα δὲ καὶ Ἐρμίαν τὸν ἀδελφὸν διὰ γραπτοῦ ἀνηγεῖσθαι σοι περὶ τούτου.

eἰχαμεν] The writer includes himself and all Christians among the recipients of the command. There is no need to limit his application of the first person plural to those who originally heard the command given.

ἵνα ἀγαπῶμεν ἀλληλοὺς] These words should probably be taken, not as dependent on ἐρωτῶ, but as defining the ἐντολὴ. The instances of the purely definitive ἵνα have been collected before.

6. αὐτῇ ἐστίν τ. ινα] Cf. 1 Jn. v. 3, iii. 23. In the first Epistle the love which is said to consist in the "keeping" of His commandments is more clearly defined as the love of God. Here it is left undefined. The immediate context (ἵνα ἀγαπῶμεν ἀλληλοὺς) suggests that the writer is thinking especially of Christian brotherly love. The highest expression of this love is found in obedience to all the commands (however variously expressed) which God has enjoined in regulation of the relations between brethren. The clearest expression of love is obedience to the will of God, so far as He has revealed His will in definite precepts. It is quite in the writer's style to make the more absolute statement, even if he is thinking particularly of a special application.

αὕτη ἡ ἐντολὴ ἐστὶν] The order of the words, if this is the true text, lays stress on ἡ ἐντολὴ. This is the one command in which all precepts are summed up.
καθὼς ἠκούσατε] If the reading ἵνα καθὼς is correct, the ἵνα which precedes ἐν αὐτῇ must be resumptive. Cf. 1 Jn. iii. 20, according to a possible interpretation of that verse. The omission of ἵνα certainly appears to be an attempt at simplification. In either case the clause must be taken with what follows, and regarded as thrown forward for the sake of emphasis.

ἵνα... περιπατῆτε] In order to avoid the appearance of tautology most commentators interpret ἐν αὐτῇ as referring to ἀγάπη, the main subject of the verse. It would be tempting to refer it to the subject of the sentence ἀληθεία (ver. 4). The one command is that we should walk in truth as we have heard it from the beginning. This would suit the following verse. But the more natural reference is to the command. Cf. the Vulgate rendering in eo (sc. mandato). If this is possible, the emphasis must be on περιπατεῖν and καθὼς ἠκούσατε. The command which sums up all the precepts, which men show their love in obeying, is the command to active obedience to God's will as it has been revealed from the beginning of the Christian life, to "abide" in what they have always known, and to let it regulate their whole conduct and life.

7. ὅτι] gives the reason for the preceding ἵνα ἐν αὐτῇ περιπατῆτε. If this refers to love, the reason given must be either (1) that the presence of such false teachers as are here described is likely to prove destructive to the exercise of mutual love among Christians, or (2) that their teaching, in denying the reality of the Incarnation, cuts away the whole foundation of Christian love as called out by the great act of love in which God expressed His love for the world. But both these interpretations are forced, and the contents of this verse point to a different interpretation of ver. 6, that, namely, which throws the emphasis on the word περιπατῶμεν. The command to mutual love grounded on true faith must be obeyed so as to find expression in action and conduct (περιπατεῖν). Otherwise the forces which make against obedience will be too strong. Many have joined the world, and their power to lead astray is great.

πλάνοι] Cf. 1 Jn. ii. 26, τῶν πλανώντων ὑμᾶς, and the accusation brought against the Lord by some of the crowd in Jn. vii. 12, πλανά τὸν δήλον: cf. also Justin Martyr's λαοπλάνον. The ἐξῆλθαν Cf. Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐρχόμενον ἐρχόμενον ἐν σαρκί. The verb probably does not refer to the excommunication or withdrawal of the false teachers (contrast Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν έληλυθότα, of which the present passage is almost certainly a reminiscence; cf. the notes on the earlier passage. The chief difference is in the tense of the participle. By the use of ἐρχόμενον instead of ἐληλυθότα the confession is taken out of all connection with time and made timeless. In the First Epistle stress was laid on the historical fact and its permanent consequences. Here the writer regards it as a continuous fact. The Incarnation is not only an event in history. It is an abiding truth. It is the writer’s view that humanity has been taken up into the Deity. The union is permanent and abiding. His view as to the exact difference in the relation of the Logos to the world and to mankind, which was brought about by the Incarnation, is not so clear. All creation was “life in Him.” Before the Incarnation “He came to His own.” But it is clear that he regarded it as a completely new revelation of what human nature was capable of becoming, and as establishing the possibility for all future time of a more real union between God and man. The Incarnation was more than a mere incident, and more than a temporary and partial connection between the Logos and human nature. It was the permanent guarantee of the possibility of fellowship, and the chief means by which it is brought about.1
NOTES ON 2 JOHN 175

7. NOTES ON 2 JOHN

Substantive does not occur in the Johannine writings except in this verse. The verb is fairly common in the Apocalypse.

ὁ πλάνος The deceiver, par excellence, known as Antichrist in popular expectation. As in the First Epistle, the writer uses the term as the convenient expression of the evil tendencies of his time. He thus spiritualizes the popular idea, but he nowhere throws any light on the general character or the details of the popular legend. The use of the plural in some Latin and Syriac authorities, supported by one or two cursives, bears witness to the difficulties felt by those who did not easily understand the drift of his language.

1 There is, however, much to be said for the simpler explanation of ἐρχόμενον, which refers it to the future manifestation of the Parousia. Cf. Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐρχόμενον ἐν σαρκί. BARNABAS VI. 9, ἐπισάτε ἐπὶ τὸν ἐν σαρκὶ μελλόντα φανερωθαι ὑμῖν Ἰησοῦν.

εξηλθον (-θαν A) ΝΑ Bal. plus15 cat. vg. (et. am. fu. demid. harl. Bed. m8 tol. prodierunt, Lcif. progressi sunt) sah. syrbodetp arm. Ir. Ps. Chr.] εσηλθον K L P al. pler. Thiphyl. Oec. Clearly a correction caused by the εἰς which follows. The form found in A is probably original | οι μὴ ομολογουντες ο μη ομολογουν 1a 2001 (83) | ομολογουν | om. 7a 55 (236) 1b 239 (386) | σαρκι+ | ei τις ουκ ομολογει Ιν Χρ ερχομενον σαρκι 1b 236-238 (-) Κ31 33 (17) | ouatos . . . αντιχριστος | ηι σαφες et antichriсти sunt m8: isi sunt fallaces et antichristi Leif.: ηι sunt seductores et antichristi syr:σαφ' : ouatos εισαι οι πλανοι και οι αντιχριστοι 1a 70, 7 (505) 1c 258 (56).

8. βλέπετε εαυτούς] Cf. Mk. xiii. 9, βλέπετε ὑμείς εαυτούς: 1 Co. xvi. 10, βλέπετε ηι άφόβως γένηται προς υμας: and for the form of expression, 1 Jn. v. 21, φυλάξατε εαυτα. “The use of the active with the reflexive pronoun . . . emphasizes the duty of personal effort.”

ηργασάμεθα] Cf. Jn. vi. 27, 28, έργαζεσθε . . . την βρωσιν την μένουσαν: and for the thought of the reward, Jn. iv. 36, ἤδη ο θερίζων μισθὸν λαμβάνει και συνάγει καρπὸν εἰς ζωὴν αἰωνίον, ἵνα ο σπείρων όμοι χαίρῃ καὶ ο θερίζων. Perhaps these passages offer a more probable source for the use of the passive for the idea of the reward than the quotation from Ru. ii. 12, ἀποτίσαι Κύριος τὴν ἐργασίαν σου γένοιτο ὁ μισθός σου πλήρη χαρίς, and ὁ θερίζων. Perhaps these passages offer a more probable source for the use of the passive for the idea of the reward than the quotation from Ru. ii. 12, ἀποτίσαι Κύριος τὴν ἐργασίαν σου γένοιτο ὁ μισθός σου πλήρης μισθὸν." Holtzmann’s criticism of this suggestion as “allzu scharfsinnig" is not unmerited. It may be of interest to notice that the reference to Ru. ii. 12 is to be found in Wettstein, who has provided or anticipated far more of the best illustrative parallels than the acknowledgments of his work in later Commentaries would lead us to suppose. Wettstein also quotes the Targum, “retribuat tibi Deus retributionem bonam operum tuorum in hoc seculo et erit merces tua perfecta in seculo futuro a Deo Israelis," and also Xen. Cyr. Exp. vii. Ἦκες αν πλήρη φέρων τὸν μισθόν.

For ἀπολαμβάνειν, cf. Ro. i. 27, τοιούτων ὁμοιοίοις: Oxyrh. Pap. ii. 298 (p. 299), ἐὰν δὲ τι ἄλλο προσοφεληται . . . εὐθέως ἀπολήμψῃ.
NOTES ON 2 JOHN

8, 9.

[8, 9. NOTES ON 2 JOHN 177]

eαυτοὺς Ν. ΑΒΠ Dam. etc.] αὐτοὺς Κ Λ Dam. Ir. Leif. | ἀπολεσητε, ἀπολαβητε Ν (ἀπολησηθε Ν*) ΑΒ 5. 13 40. 66. 68. 73. 137 διερ μερικο ἀφαιρετικον. 14 cat. vg. sah. cop. syr arm. aeth. Ir. Leif. Ps.-Chr. Isid. Dam. Thphyl\[\text{oem} \text{Oec\[\text{om}]] \text{αι} \text{απολεσηθει}. \text{αι} \text{απολαβητε} \text{Κ } \text{Λ } \text{P } 31 \text{al. plu. Thphyl\[\text{ext} \text{Oec\[\text{ext}]] \text{αι} \text{εἰργασαθεθε} \text{A } 5. 13. 40. 66. 68. 73. 137 διερ μερικον cat. vg. cop. syr\[\text{ed} \text{et} \text{p} \text{ext} \text{arm. aeth. Ir. Leif. Ps.-Chr. Isid. Dam. Thphyl\[\text{oem} \text{Oec\[\text{om}]] \text{αι} \text{εἰργασαθη} \text{καλα Κ' } \text{ιοφ } \text{κλη } \text{πληρης } \text{L } \text{Dam. (cf. Jn. i. 14).}

According to Tischendorf's note it would seem that what is probably the true text is supported by B sah. syr\[\text{mg} only.  \text{See note above.}

9. ὁ προάγων καὶ μὴ μένων ἐν τῇ διδαχῇ | The phrase should be taken as a whole. The sarcastic reference of προάγων to the claims of false teachers to the possession of a higher knowledge and more progressive intelligence was naturally misunderstood. The παραβαίνων of the Receptus was the inevitable result. What was not understood had to be corrected into an intelligible commonplace. If this were the true text, we should have to supply as object τὴν διδαχήν from the following ἐν τῇ διδαχῇ. But the originality of προάγων is obvious. For the use of προάγων, Windisch quotes Sir. xx. 27, ὁ σοφὸς ἐν λόγοις προάξει εαυτόν.

The non-repetition of the article before μὴ μένων is significant. All "progress" is not condemned, but only such progress as does not fulfil the added condition of "abiding in the teaching."

ἐν τῇ διδαχῇ τοῦ Χριστοῦ | There is nothing in the context or the usage of the N.T. to suggest that τοῦ Χριστοῦ should be regarded as an objective genitive, the writer meaning by the phrase "the apostolical teaching about Christ." Such an interpretation would seem to be the outcome of preconceived notions of what the author ought to have meant rather than of what his words indicate. Cf. Jn. xviii. 19, ἡ ἡρωτήσαν αὐτὸν . . . περὶ τῆς διδαχῆς αὐτοῦ: Jn. vii. 16, ἡ ἐμὴ διδαχὴ ὤκ ἐστιν ἐμὴ ἀλλὰ τοῦ πέμψαντός με . . . γνώσται περὶ τῆς διδαχῆς, where there is the same transition to the absolute use of the word which is found in this verse. Cf. also Mt. vii. 28; Mk. iv. 2; Lk. iv. 32; Ac. ii. 42; Ac. ii. 14 (τὴν διδαχὴν Βαλαάμ), ii. 15 (τῶν Νικολαίτων). The "teaching" no doubt includes the continuation of Christ's work by His Apostles, but it begins in the work of Christ Himself. In the view of the writer all true teaching is but the application of "ὁ λόγος ὁ ἐμὸς" He did not regard Paul or any other Apostle as the inventor of most of what was characteristic of the Christian Faith as he knew it.

θεὸν οὐκ ἔχει | Cf. i Jn. ii. 22 f., a passage of which this verse is probably a summary. It is hardly intelligible except in the light of that passage, or of teaching similar to that which it contains. The true revelation of God was given in Jesus Christ. He who rejects the truth about Christ cannot enjoy the fellowship with God which Christ has made possible for men.
οὗτος καὶ Κ.Τ.Λ.] Cf. I Jn. ii. 23 ff. and notes. As was pointed out in the Introduction and also in the notes on that passage, the words can refer equally well to Gnostic claims to a superior knowledge of the Father, and to Jewish opponents who shared with their Christian antagonists the belief in the God of Israel.

οὐχ οὶ ἐρχομένοι Τὸν Ού καὶ τὸν υἱόν] Cf. Didache xi. 1, 2, δὲ ἐὰν οὐν ἐλθὼν διδάξῃ γας τότε απόκλητος εἰσὶν. τὸ δὲ τούτων διδασκαλίαν τούτην τὴν πατήρα καὶ τὸν θεόν τὸν πατήρα καὶ τὸν υἱόν N BK LP al. pler. cat. vg. sah. cop. syr. pæd. sah. aeth. Leif. Did. | καὶ τὸν τοῦ υἱοῦ N BK LP al. pler. cat. vg. sah. cop. syr. pæd. sah. aeth. Leif. Did. | καὶ τὸν τοῦ υἱοῦ post ex.] 10. εἰ τις ἔρχεται κ.τ.λ.] Cf. Didache xi. 1, 2, δὲ ἐὰν οὐν ἐλθὼν διδάξῃ γας τότε απόκλητος εἰσὶν. τὸ δὲ τούτων διδασκαλίαν τούτην τὴν πατήρα καὶ τὸν υἱόν N BK LP al. pler. cat. vg. sah. cop. syr. pæd. sah. aeth. Leif. Did. | καὶ τὸν τοῦ υἱοῦ N BK LP al. pler. cat. vg. sah. cop. syr. pæd. sah. aeth. Leif. Did. | καὶ τὸν τοῦ υἱοῦ post ex. | Ποιος εἰς τὴν καθημερινὴ διδασκαλίαν αὐτοῦ αὐτοῦ ἀκούσῃ; There is nothing in the Epistle itself to indicate that this verse "at last discloses the special purpose of the whole Epistle." Its purpose is clearly to encourage those to whom it is addressed to continue in the active exercise of the faith and love which they had learned from Christ and His Apostles, even to the point of refusing hospitality to those who claimed to come in Christ's name, but who, in the writer's opinion, were destroying the work of Christ by their teaching.

The form of the conditional sentence used presents the case as more than a mere possibility, rather as something not unlikely to happen.

ἐρχεται πρὸς υμᾶς] The usage of ἐρχεται in the Johannine Epistles is confined to the "coming" of Christ, or Antichrist, or of the brethren visiting another Church (3 Jn. 3), or of the Elder paying a formal visit (3 Jn. 10, ἐὰν ἐλθοῦ). It is dangerous to read a special sense into common words. But clearly the accompanying condition, καὶ ταύτην τὴν διδασκαλίαν συνεχεῖ, limits the reference to those who claim to come as Christians, and to have a "teaching" to communicate to the members of the Church. The context excludes the idea that the writer is thinking of "casual visits of strangers." Those to whom he would refuse recognition claim to be received as brethren by fellow-Christians. In his view their conduct has made that impossible.

μη λαμβάνετε εἰς οἰκίαν] For the use of the verb, cf. Jn. i. 12, ὁσοὶ δὲ ἔλαβον αὐτὸν: vi. 21, λαβεῖν αὐτὸν εἰς τὸ πλοῖον: xiii. 20, ὃς ἔλαβον ἃν τινα πέμψῃ ἐμὲ λαμβάνει.
χαίρειν . . . μὴ λέγετε] Elsewhere in the N.T. χαίρειν is only used in the greeting at the beginning of Epistles (Ac. xv. 23, xxiii. 26; Ja. i. 1). These passages throw no light on the question whether the welcome at meeting or the farewell greeting is meant. There is really nothing in the usage of the word or in the context to decide the question. We may perhaps compare Lk. x. 5, εἰς ἣν δ᾽ ἀν εἰσέλθητε αὐτίκα πρῶτον λέγετε Εἴρην τῷ οἴκῳ τοῦτῳ. In the LXX the use of χαίρειν in this sense is confined to the letters contained in the Books of the Maccabees.

ei τις ερχεται] or εισερχεται Ιε 506 (60) | ταυτην post διδαχην 31 | autω] πρ. εν Ιε 114 (335).

11. This verse gives the grounds on which the injunctions of the preceding verse are based. The welcome and greeting contemplated are clearly such as express approval of the character and work of those who claim such reception.

κοινωνεῖ] always expresses a participation realized in active intercourse. It never denotes a mere passing sharing. Cf. 1 Ti. v. 22; 1 P. iv. 13.

tοῖς πονηροῖς] The form of expression is chosen which lays greatest stress on the adjective. Cf. 1 Jn. ii. 7, 8, i. 2, 3; Jn. x. 11.

οὐκ ἐβουλήθην] One of the more certain instances in the N.T. of the epistolary aorist.

χάρτου καὶ μέλανος] Cf. the similar phrase in 3 Jn. 13, μέλανος καὶ καλάμου, and 2 Co. iii. 3, ὁ μέλανος ἀλλὰ πνεύματι. The material denoted is, of course, papyrus, the usual material for correspondence and for the cheaper kinds of books. Contrast 2 Ti. iv. 13, μάλιστα τὰς μεμβράνας. Cf. Jer xliii. (xxxvi.) 23, ἐξέλπην πᾶς ὁ χάρτης εἰς τὸ πῦρ.

gενέσθαι] If there is any difference of meaning between this word and the more usual ἐλθεῖν into which it has been altered in the Textus Receptus, γενέσθαι seems rather to mean to "pay a visit" (cf. 1 Co. ii. 3, xvi. 10, ἣν ἀφόβως γένιται πρὸς ύμᾶς). The intercourse which the coming makes possible is emphasized rather than the actual fact of coming. But cf. Tebtunis Pap. ii. 298 (p. 421), ἀμα τῷ λαβεῖν σε ταῦτα μου τὰ γράμματα γενοῦ.
πρὸς μὲ, and also Jn. vi. 21 (ἔγενετο ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς), 25. πότε ὃς γέγονας; στόμα πρὸς στόμα] Cf. 3 Jn. 14, and 1 Cor. xiii. 12, πρόσωπων πρὸς πρόσωπων: Nu. xii. 8, στόμα κατὰ στόμα (Ἡ ἥ ἡ).

ἰνα ἦ χαρὰ κ.τ.λ.] Cf. 1 Jn. 1. 4; 3 Jn. 4. The object of the proposed visit is the same as that which the writer had in view in writing the First Epistle. It is generally to be noticed that the closest parallels in the Johannine writings are given some slightly different turn in different circumstances, which suggests that in both cases the writer is using his own favourite expressions rather than copying those of another.

13. The natural explanation of σέ and τὰ τέκνα is undoubtedly that which identifies the mother with her children, the Church, with the individual members of which it is composed. There is no difficulty in inventing hypotheses to account in other ways for the change between the singular and plural (cf. especially the ὑμᾶς of the preceding verse), and the absence of any greeting from the “elect sister” herself. But is it worth while in view of the fact that so much simpler an explanation lies ready to hand? Cf. Windisch, “Die Grüsse (nicht der Neffen und Nichten, sondern) der Glaubensgewissen am Orte des Schreibers.”

tῆς ἐκλεκτῆς] Cf. ver. 1. The word does not occur elsewhere in the Johannine writings except in the Apocalypse (xvii. 14, οἱ μετ᾽ αὐτοῦ κλητοὶ καὶ ἐκλεκτοὶ καὶ πιστοί). But the writer’s use of it is perfectly natural in the light of Jn. xv. 16, 19, ἀλλ᾽ ἐξελεξάμην ὑμᾶς, and other passages in the Fourth Gospel and also in the Synoptists. Cf. 1 P. v. 13; Ro. xvi. 13.
NOTES ON 3 JOHN.

1. ὁ πρεσβύτερος] Cf. 2 Jn. 1 note.

Γαῖῳ] Three persons of this name are mentioned in the N.T. (1) Gaius the Macedonian, who is mentioned together with Aristarchus in connection with the tumult in the theatre at Ephesus (Ac. xix. 29). They are described as Macedonians, fellow travellers of S. Paul. (2) Gaius of Derbe, one of S. Paul’s companions on his last journey to Jerusalem. (3) Gaius of Corinth. Cf. Ro. xvi. 23, Γαιός ὁ ξένος μου καὶ δύλης τῆς ἐκκλησίας: 1 Co. i. 14, Κρίσπον καὶ Γάιον, whom S. Paul mentions as the only Corinthians, besides the household of Stephanas, whom he had baptized himself. Of this Gaius, Origen says that according to tradition he was the first Bishop of Thessalonica. Cf. Origen, Comm. in Ro. x. 41, “Fertur sane traditione maiorum quod hic Gaius primus episcopus fuerit Thessalonicensis ecclesiae.” Dom Chapman’s ingenious attempt to connect the Epistle with Thessalonica on this ground is not convincing (see Introd.). Coenen (ZWTh., 1872, p. 264 ff.) has attempted to show that Gaius of Corinth is intended in the “fictitious” address of this Epistle, on the ground of the similarity of the conditions prevailing here and at Corinth, as testified by the Pauline Epistles. The similarities are of too general a character either to compel identification or even to make it probable. Coenen’s interpretation of ὁ ἐρχόμενος (2 Co. xi. 4) as a “pillar apostle whom S. Paul’s opponents threatened to invite to Corinth to overthrow his authority,” is certainly not helped by the statement in our Epistle of the Elder’s intention of paying a visit to the Church of Gaius. But perhaps it is not necessary now to spend time in dealing with the theory that the two smaller Johannine Epistles owe their origin to the desire of the “great unknown” to gain credence for the view that his more important forgeries (the Gospel and First Epistle) were really the work of the son of Zebedee. As Windisch says, “III. (i.e. 3 Jn.) für Fiktion zu erklären, widerspricht allen gesunden Sinnen.” The statement in Const. Apostol. vii. 46, that Gaius was the first Bishop of Pergamus, is of too slight historical value to guide our conjectures as to the recipient of this Epistle (vid. Introd.). Bartlet's suggestion of Thyatira does not claim more than relative probability. But all such attempts at identification of the Church or the individual addressed are mere speculation. Where our knowledge is inadequate the building up of hypothesis is of the nature of pastime rather than of serious work. Truer scholarship is seen in Harnack's less interesting judgment, “Gaius, to whom (the Epistle) is addressed, receives no title of honour. That he occupied a prominent position in his Church is clear from what follows.” In Commentaries, if not in periodicals, the rule should be remembered that “there is a time to keep silence.”

τῷ ἀγαπητῷ] A favourite word of the writer of these Epistles, in which it occurs ten times, though it is not found in the Gospel. For its use in salutations, cf. Ro. i. 7, xvi. 5, 8, 9, 12; Col. iv. 9, 14; 2 Ti. i. 2; Philem. 1. ὅν . . . ἀληθεία] Cf. 2 Jn. 1 (notes).

cω] om. boh-cod.

2. περὶ πάντων] must be taken with εὐοδοῦσθαι. The writer prays for the prosperity of Gaius in all respects, and especially in the matter of health. There is no need to alter περὶ πάντων into the conventional πρὸ πάντων of epistolary introductions. The converse change would be far more likely to have taken place.

eὐοδοῦσθαι] Bartlet's ingenious conjecture that the other name of Gaius may have been Euodias, is again outside the sphere of commentary. The word is part of the common and conventional language of Epistles. For its use in the N.T., compare Ro. i. 10; 1 Co. xvi. 2. Cf. also Hermes, Sim. vi. 3, 5.

δηλαίειν] The word may possibly suggest that Gaius' health had caused his friends anxiety; but it certainly does not necessarily do so. Its use in letters is conventional. Cf. Oxyrh. Pap. ii. 293 (p. 293), Διονύσιος Διονύσιος τῆς ἀδελφῆς χαίρει καὶ δία τῶν ἀντών ὑγιαίνειν, and ii. 292 (p. 292), πρὸ δὲ πάντων ὑγιαίνειν σε εὖ χαίρειν καὶ πάντα ὑγιαίνειν τὰ ἀριστα πρᾶσσων. καθὼς . . . ψυχή] Cf. Philo, Quis rer. div. heres, p. 514 (Wendland, iii. p. 65). Philo is commenting on “μετ' εἴρήνης τραφείς” (Gn. xv. 15). Πότε οὖν τοῦτο συμβῆσται; ὅταν εὐοδῇ μὲν τὰ ἐκτὸς πρὸς εὐπορίαν καὶ εὐδοξίαν, εὐοδῇ δὲ τὰ σῶματος πρὸς ὑγιαίνειν καὶ λογίν, εὐοδῇ δὲ τὰ ψυχῆς πρὸς ἀπόλαυσιν ἀρετῶν. The reference is to be found in Wettstein.

8. ἐχάρην Cf. 2 Jn. 4; Ph. iv. 10.

ἐρχομένων... καὶ μαρτυρούντων] The tense almost precludes the reference of the words to a single occasion, and their evidence should not be so interpreted in attempts to discover the historical setting of the Epistles. They suggest rather the means by which the Elder kept himself in touch with the Churches for whose welfare he regarded himself as responsible, and over which he exercised his supervision.

σου τῇ ἀληθείᾳ] As always in the Johannine writings, “truth” covers every sphere of life, moral, intellectual, spiritual. Those who visited Ephesus had from time to time borne witness that Gaius’ whole life corresponded to the highest standard of life and conduct.

περιπατεῖς] Cf. note on 1 Jn. i. 6.

ἐρχομένων... καὶ μαρτυρούντων] The tense almost precludes the reference of the words to a single occasion, and their evidence should not be so interpreted in attempts to discover the historical setting of the Epistles. They suggest rather the means by which the Elder kept himself in touch with the Churches for whose welfare he regarded himself as responsible, and over which he exercised his supervision.

σου τῇ ἀληθείᾳ] As always in the Johannine writings, “truth” covers every sphere of life, moral, intellectual, spiritual. Those who visited Ephesus had from time to time borne witness that Gaius’ whole life corresponded to the highest standard of life and conduct.

περιπατεῖς] Cf. note on 1 Jn. i. 6.

τοῦτων explained by the clause introduced by ἵνα. The plural is used instead of the singular, as the writer is thinking of more than one occasion on which he had experienced the joy of which he speaks. If this explanation of the plural is correct there is no need to correct the text by supplying ἦ before ἰα, as Wilamowitz suggests (Hermes, 1898, p. 531). In his interesting note on the Epistle he does not offer any explanation of τοῦτων.

Cf. Jn. xv. 13, μείζονα τάς ἀγάπην οὐδεὶς ἔχει, ἵνα τις ὑποδέχηται τότε τῶν ἄνδρων. The η is actually found in one Greek cursive.

χαράν] The variant χάριν is probably due to a scribe, who substituted a commoner phrase. Cf. 2 Cor. i. 15. For χαρά, cf. 1 Jn. i. 4; 2 Jn 12; Philem. 7.

τά ἐμὰ τέκνα] Those over whom he exercises his fatherly supervision, whether actually his “children in the faith” or not. The bearing of this phrase on the meaning of τέκνα in the Second Epistle should not be overlooked.

Cf. vv. 1, 2. πιστῶν ποιεῖς] either (1) “thou doest a faithful thing,” an action corresponding to the faith that is in thee, which is the natural meaning of the word, if we consider the general usage of the writer, though there is no exact parallel; or (2) "thou makest sure whatsoever thou mayest do," thou doest that which shall not "fail of its true issue," shall receive its due reward.
Cf. Xen. (quoted by Wettstein) ἄν μὲν δέν ταῦτα ποιεῖν πιστά, δρήμους δοτέον.

δ ἐὰν ἐργάση] The judgment is expressed absolutely, the present tense being used. The δ ἐὰν ἐργάση covers both the past action, to which the recipients of Gaius' hospitality have borne public witness before the Ephesian Church, and the future benefits, which the Elder feels confident that Gaius will confer at his request.

καὶ τοῦτο ξένους] For καὶ τοῦτο, cf. 1 Co. vi. 6, ἀδελφὸς μετὰ ἀδελφοῦ κρίνεται, καὶ τοῦτο ἐπὶ ἀπίστων: Ph. i. 28, ἐνδεέεις . . .
ἡμῶν δὲ σωτηρίας, καὶ τοῦτο ἀπὸ θεοῦ: Eph. ii. 8, τῇ γὰρ χάριτι ἐστὶ σωσσαμένου διὰ πίστεως καὶ τοῦτο οὐκ εἶ ἢ ὑμῶν. Its use in Ro. xiii. 11 is rather different.

The recognition of the duty of φιλοξενία among Christians is fully testified, 1 Ti. v. 10; Ro. xii. 13; He. xiii. 2; 1 P. iv. 9, as also the special duties of the leaders in this respect, 1 Ti.
iii. 2; Tit. i. 8. Cf. also Herm. Sim. ix. 27, ἐκ δὲ τοῦ ὀροὺς τοῦ dεκάτου, οὐ γὰρ δένδρα σκεπάζοντα πρόβατα των, οἱ πιστεύσαντες toioīs εἰς ἐπίσκοπον φιλοξενοῦν, οἴτινες ἡδέως εἰς τοὺς οἰκους ἐκείνων πάντοτε ὑπεδέξασθεν τοὺς δούλους τοῦ θεοῦ ἀτερ ὑποκρίσεως
. . . οὖτοι οὖν πάντες σκεπασθήσοντα ὑπὸ τοῦ κυρίου διαπαντὸς.
Justin, Apol. i. 67, αὐτός (sc. ὁ προεστῶς) ἐπικούρει . . . καὶ τοὺς παρεπιδήμους οὐσί ξένους.

πιστῶν] pr. al. et cod.: ἐμαρτύρησαν κ. τ. Ἡ.

καὶ τοῦτο ξένους] The absence of the article is significant.
The anarthrous phrase denotes a meeting of the Church at which the witness was borne. It is natural to interpret this verse as referring to one of the occasions mentioned in ver. 3, or more than one if the witness is to be regarded as a single fact, though including a series of acts.

ἐνώπιον ἐκκλησίας] The absence of the article is significant.
The anarthrous phrase denotes a meeting of the Church at which the witness was borne. Cf. 1 Co. xiv. 19, 35, ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ:
Jn. xviii. 20, ἐν συναγωγῇ καὶ ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ: also vi. 59.

καλὸς ποίησες προτέμψις] The reading ποίησας προτέμψις is probably a correction. καλὸς ποίησες is a common phrase in letters, and no special stress should be laid on it. It is a conventional expression. In many papyrus letters the double future occurs. Many letter writers would have written καλῶς ποιήσεις προπέμψεις. But the textual evidence does not justify our attributing such a solecism to the author. For the phrase, cf. Tebtunis Pap. i. 56, p. 167, καλῶς οὖν ποιήσεις ἐυχαριστήσῃς πρῶτον μὲν τοῖς θεοῖς δεύτερον δὲ σώσαι ψυχὰς πολλάς: 57, p. 168, καλῶς οὖν ποιήσεις ἀπολύσας αὐτούς: Oxyrh. Pap. ii. 294 (p. 294), εὖ οὖν ποιήσας γράψας μου ἀντιφώνησιν: 297 (p. 298), καλῶς ποιῆσες γράψεις διὰ πιττικών: 299 (p. 300), καλῶς ποιῆσες πέμψεις μου αὐτάς: 300 (p. 301), καλῶς ποιῆσες ἀντιφωνήσας μου ὅτι ἐκομίσου: i. 116 (p. 182), καλῶς οὖν ποιήσατες δότε παράμμωνι. It is so common that a schoolboy uses it sarcastically, i. 119, καλῶς ἐποίησες οὐκ ἀπένηχές πε μετέ σοῦ εἰς πόλιν. Cf. also ps.-Aristias, 39, καλῶς οὖν ποιήσεις καὶ τῆς ἡμετέρας σπουδῆς ἀξίως ἐπιλεξάμενος ἄνδρας κ.7. A.: 46, καλῶς οὖν ποιήσεις . . . προστάξεις.

προπέμψας] Cf. Tit. iii. 13, σπουδαίως πρόπεμψον ἵνα μηδὲν αὐτοῖς λείπῃ. It is also found in Acts and the earlier Pauline Epistles (Ro.; 1, 2 Co.).

ἀξίως τοῦ θεοῦ} Cf. Ἐ θ. ii. 12, εἰς τὸ περιπατεῖν ἀξίως τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ καλοῦς υμᾶς κ.τ.λ. The adverb is also found with the following genitives: τῶν ἁγίων (Ro. xvi. 2), τῆς κλήσεως (Eph. iv. 1), τοῦ εὐαγγελίου τοῦ Χριστοῦ (Phil. i. 27), τοῦ κυρίου (Col. i. 10).

7. ὑπὲρ γὰρ τοῦ ὄνοματος] gives the reason why they deserve such help. For the phrase, cf. Ac. v. 41, χαίροντες . . . ὅτι κατηξιώθησαν ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὄνοματος ἀτιμασθῆναι. We may also compare Ro. i. 5, ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὄνοματος αὐτοῦ. Dom Chapman's interpretation of the phrase as hinting at "withdrawal from the scene of persecution," or even banishment, at a time when the mere fact of being a Christian was enough to procure condemnation (cf. 1 P. iv. 14, εἰ ὀνειδίζεσθε ἐν ὀνόματι Χριστοῦ: 15, μὴ ὡς φονεῖς . . . εἰ δὲ ὤς Χριστιανὸς, μὴ αἰσχυνέσθω) is wholly unnatural. As Bartlet has pointed out, it might be possible if the phrase used were διὰ τὸ ὄνομα.

The absolute use of τοῦ ὄνομα, which is found in the passage quoted from Acts (cf. also Ph. ii. 9), is also to be found in Ignatius (ad Eph. iii. εἰ γὰρ καὶ δέδεμαι ἐν τῷ ὄνοματι: vii. εἰσόθαυν γὰρ τινς δόλῳ πονηρῷ τὸ ὄνομα περιφέρειν ἄλλα τινὰ πράσσοντες ἀνάξια θεοῦ: ad Philad. x. δοξάσαι τὸ ὄνομα). The "name" is clearly that of Christ. The fact that their having gone out on behalf of the name is put forward as the reason why they deserve hospitality, certainly does not carry with it the necessity of regarding the "name" as that of "brother." Missionaries no doubt proclaimed the brotherhood of believers, but their first duty was to proclaim the name of Christ.

ἐξῆλθαν] probably from Ephesus, though Dr. Westcott's more cautious statement, "from some Church well known to the Apostle and Gaius," is alone completely justified by the facts known to us from the Epistle and by the language used.

μηδὲν λαμβάνοντες] The form of the sentence (μηδὲν) states more than the bare fact. It was their custom, a custom which emphasized the character of their work, to carry out the spirit of the Commission to the Twelve (Mt. x. 8, δωρεάν ἐλάβετε, δωρεάν δότε), and the tradition established by Paul (cf. 2 Co. xii. 14, ἐτοίμως ἐξώ ἐλθεῖν πρὸς υμᾶς, καὶ οὐ καταναρκήσω οὐ γὰρ ξητῶ τὰ υμῶν ἀλλ' υμᾶς: 1 Th. ii. 9, νυκτός καὶ ἡμέρας ἐργαζόμενοι πρὸς τὸ μῆ ἐπιβαρησαί τινα υμῶν ἐκηρύξαμεν εἰς υμᾶς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ θεοῦ. They carried out as their rule of mission work the Pauline custom of refusing support from those amongst whom they were working as Missionaries. They had therefore a special claim on the hospitality and help of the Churches in places through which they had to pass. There is an interesting parallel to the sentence in the Didache xi. 6, ἐξερχόμενοι δὲ δὴ ἀπόστολος μηδὲν λαμβανέτω εἰ μὴ ἀρτόν, ἕως οὗ αὐλισθῇ, ἐὰν δὲ ἀργύριον αἰτή ψευδοπροφήτης ἐστίν. It is hardly necessary to deal at length with the interpretation which connects εξῆλθαν with ἀπὸ τῶν ἐθνικῶν, and bases their claim to help on the fact that they had been expelled from their home because of their faith, "eiecti erat propter religionem ab extraneis, nihilque secum apportauerunt " (Carpzov quoted by Poggel).

ἀπὸ τῶν ἐθνικῶν] For λαμβάνειν with ἀπό, cf. Mt. xvii. 25, ἀπὸ τίνων λαμβάνουσιν τέλη; and for the contrast between Christians and ἐθνικοί, οἵ, Mt. v. 47, ἐὰν ἀστάσησθε τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς ὑμῶν μόνον, τί περισσότερον ποιεῖτε; οὐκι καὶ ὁ ἐθνικὸς τὸ αὐτὸ ποιεῖν οὐκ ἔχει;

8. ἡμεῖς οὖν] In view of their policy of refusing support from the heathen to whom they minister, we Christians are under a special obligation to do what we can to forward their work.

dοείλομεν] Cf. I Jn. ii. 6, iii. 16, iv. 11, and Jn. xiii. 14.  Υπολαμβάνειν] The ἀπολαμβάνειν of the Textus Receptus must be merely a scribe's error; the word is always used in the sense of receiving or getting, or getting back what is due (cf.
2 Jn. 8, μισθὸν πλήρη ἀπολάβητε. ὑπολαμβάνειν occurs elsewhere in the N.T. only in the Lucan writings, in the various senses of answer, suppose, receive (νεφέλη ὑπέλαβεν αὐτὸν ἀπὸ τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν, Ac. i. 9). The usage of the LXX is similar. But in other Greek it is often used in the sense of receiving with hospitality, and especially of supporting. Cf. Strabo, p. 653, οἱ εὐπόροι τοὺς ἑυθεῖας ὑπολαμβάνοντας. It suggests support as well as welcome.

tοὺς τοιούτους] Cf. 1 Co. xvi. 16, ἵνα καὶ χρηματικῶς ὑποτάσσεσθε τοῖς τοιούτοις καὶ παντὶ τῷ συνεργοῦτι, and ver. 18, ἐνεργειάτε οὖν τοῖς τοιούτοις. All who act on such principles have a claim on our help and support.

συνεργοὶ γιν. τῇ ἀληθείᾳ] The word may mean either (1) become fellow-workers with them in the cause of the truth, or (2) become fellow-workers with the Truth. In support of (1) are quoted 2 Co. viii. 23, κοινωνὸς ἐμὸς καὶ εἰς τινὰς συνεργοὺς: Col. iv. 11, οὗτοι μόνοι συνεργοὶ εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ. There is no other example of συνεργοὶ with the dative in the N.T., the usual construction being with the genitive, either of the person or the work, or with a preposition. But the dative with συνεργεῖν is not uncommon. Cf. Ja. ii. 22, ἡ πίστες συνήργει τοῖς ἐργοῖς αὐτοῦ. Cf. also 1 Es. vii. 2, συνεργοῦντες τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις τῶν Ἰουδαίων: 1 Mac. xii. 1, ὁ καιρὸς αὐτοῦ συνεργεῖ. In view of this usage, and the writer's use of ἀληθεία, which he often almost personifies, the second is more probably the correct interpretation. Cf. ver. 12, ἀπʼ αὐτῆς τῆς ἀληθείας.

υπολαμβανεῖν Ν A B C 13, 16, 27, 29, 46, 66* 68, 73. 126* Οeccod]
| γινωμεθα] post ἀληθεία Ia 231 (326): γενωμεθα K 42. 69. 105 al. fere. 10
| cat. Thphyl: γενωμεθα C 100 | ἀληθεια cat. Thphyl: ekklhsiia Ν* A.

9. ἔγραψα] The addition of αὐς is clearly an attempt to remove the (supposed) difficulty of admitting that a letter written by an Apostle has not been preserved, or couldn't have failed in its object. It must have been added at a time when the supposed reference to the Second Epistle was unknown, or at any rate not accepted.

τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ] Cf. Mt. xx. 20, αἰτοῦσά τι ἀπʼ αὐτοῦ. It must be taken as strictly indefinite. It suggests neither something great (Gal. ii. 6, τῶν δοκούντων εἶναι τι) nor something insignificant. Its omission in the Textus receptus is probably due to error.

τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ] The local Church of which Gaius and Diotrephes were members. Cf. S. Paul's usage in his earlier Epistles (1, 2 Th.; Gal.; 1, 2 Co.) and the usage of the Apocalypse (i. 4, ii. 1, etc.).

In spite of the close resemblance in form between the Second and Third Epistles, which certainly favours the view that they are companion Epistles, and the many points of similarity in the circumstances of the Churches to which, or to members of which, they are addressed, the context of ver. 9 makes it almost impossible to see in the words ἔγραψά τι τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ a reference to the Second Epistle. (Cf. Introduction, lxxiii.) It must, of course, be admitted that Diotrephes probably favoured, or at least condoned, the Gnostic or other teaching which the writer condemns in the Second Epistle. And in spite of what Harnack has said, it is doubtful whether that Epistle “must have contained a reference to the sins of Diotrephes if it had been addressed to the Church of which he was a member.” But ver. 9 must be read as it stands, between verses 8 and 10. The reception, or the refusal to receive, the Missionary brethren is the subject of both these verses. The letter to which reference is made in the intermediate verse, and which the writer fears that Diotrephes will suppress or persuade his Church to neglect, if, indeed, he has not already done so, must have contained some reference to the question of the hospitable reception of these brethren. If we add to this the totally different aim of the two letters, on which Harnack rightly lays stress, the warning not to receive false brethren in the Second, and the exhortation to welcome the true brethren in the Third Epistle, the case against the supposed reference is convincingly strong. The most natural interpretation of the words is that the Elder wrote to the Church a letter of similar content to the private letter to Gaius, exhorting them to show hospitality to Demetrius and the brethren whom he commends to their care: but knowing the power of Diotrephes to oppose his wishes he wrote a private letter to Gaius, a member of the Church on whose loyalty he could thoroughly depend. The Second Epistle, with its sharply expressed prohibition of any intercourse with those who claimed the rights of brethren, but who had forfeited them by their false teaching, fails altogether to correspond to the requirements of the case.

ἀλλ᾽ The letter had been written, but the writer feared that it would fail to secure the carrying out of his wishes.

φιλοπρωτεύων] not found elsewhere, except in Patristic writings, where it is derived from this passage. A scholion in Matthaei (p. 162) explains it as equivalent to ὑφαρπάζων τὰ πρωτεῖα. The cognate φιλόπρωτος and φιλοπρωτεία are both found. Of the passages quoted by Wettstein in illustration of the word two will suffice: Plutarch, Alcibiad. p. 192, φίλου δὲ πολλῶν ὄντων καὶ μεγάλων παθῶν ἐν αὐτῷ τὸ φιλόνεικόν ἰσχυρότατον ἦν καὶ τὸ φιλόπρωτον: Agesil. 596 D, φιλονεικότατος γὰρ ὃν καὶ θυμοειδέστατος ἐν τοῖς νέοις καὶ πάντα πρωτεύειν βουλόμενος.
The word expresses ambition, the desire to have the first place in everything. It should not be pressed either to prove or disprove the possession by Diotrephes of an “episcopal” position. It certainly does not suggest “aspiring to a place not already obtained.”

αὐτῶν] The members of the Church to which the Elder had written. For the construction, cf. 1 Co. i. 2, τῷ ἐκκλησίᾳ τοῦ θεοῦ . . . ἡμιασθενεὶς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ.

οὐκ ἐπιδέχεται ὡμᾶς] ἐπιδέχεσθαι is not found in the N.T., except here and in the following verse, where it is used in a somewhat different sense. Diotrephes refuses to recognize the authority of the Elder and those who side with him. Cf. 1 Mac. x. 1, κατελάβετο Πτολεμαίδα καὶ ἐπεδέχατο αὐτὸν καὶ ἐβασίλευσεν εἰκή: xii. 8, ἐπεδέχατο . . . τὸν ἀνδρα . . . ἐνδόξως: xii. 43, xiv. 23. In papyri it is used for “accepting” the terms, of a lease, etc. (esp. ἐπιδέχομαι μισθώσασθαι). For its use in ver. 10 we may compare Oxyrh. Pap. ii. 281 (p. 272), ἐγὼ μὲν οὖν ἐπιδέχαμαι αὐτὸν εἰς τὰ τῶν γόνεων μου οἰκήτηρια λειτόν οὖντα.

10. διὰ τοῦτο] Because of his refusal to recognize our authority, and the lengths to which he has gone in opposing us in consequence.

ἐὰν ἐλθω] Those who find in the Second Epistle the letter to which ver. 9 refers naturally see in these words a reference to ver. 12 of that Epistle (ἐλπίζω γενέσθαι πρὸς υμᾶς). They are equally well explained by the expectation expressed in ver. 14 of this letter. The writer perhaps speaks somewhat less confidently (ἐὰν) of his coming than he does of the arrival of false teachers in the Church to which 2 Jn. is addressed (εἴ τις ἐρχεται). But the difference between the two constructions cannot be pressed.

ὑπομνήσω] Cf. Jn. xiv. 26, ὑπομνήσει υμᾶς πάντα ἀ εἰπον υμῖν ἐγώ. The Elder will recall to them the whole conduct of their leader and show it in its true light.

τὰ ἐργα] Cf. Jn. iii. 19 ff. (ἐνα μὴ ἐλεγχθῇ τὰ ἐργα αὐτοῦ . . . ἐνα φανερωθῇ αὐτοῦ τὰ ἐργα). The writer is confident that the conduct of Diotrephes will not stand the light of truth, and that the Church will recognize the fact.

λόγοις πονηροῖς κ.τ.λ.] Two accusations are brought against Diotrephes: his boastful opposition to the Elder and his friends, and his harsh action in the matter of the Missionaries.
The Epistles of S. John

[190]

\[ \text{φλυαρῶν} \] Cf. 1 Ti. v. 13, οὗ μόνον δὲ ἀργαὶ ἄλλα καὶ φλυαροὶ (μερόθαι, vg.) καὶ περὶ ἐργοῖ, λαλοῦσα τὰ μὴ δεόντα. Oecumenius interprets ἀντὶ τοῦ λοιποῦν, κακολογοῦν. The word is not found elsewhere in the N.T. It emphasizes the emptiness of the charges which Diotrephes brings against the Elder in so many words.

\[ \text{μὴ ἀρκεσθεὶς ἐπὶ τούτοις} \] Cf. 1 Ti. vi. 8, τοὐτοὶς ἀρκεσθησόμεθα: ἤε. xiii. 5, ἀρκούμενοι τοὺς παροῦσιν. The construction with ἐπί is not found elsewhere in the N.T. The nearest parallel to this passage is, perhaps, 2 Mac. v. 15, οὐκ ἀρκεθεῖν δὲ τούτοις κατετόλμησεν εἰς τὸ . . . ἱερὸν εἰσελθεῖν.

\[ \text{oūte . . . καὶ} \] For the construction, cf. Jn. iv. 11, οὔτε ἄντλημα ἐχεὶς καὶ τὸ φρέαρ ἐστὶν βαθύ.

ἐπιδέχεσται τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς Cf. note on ver. 9. This refusal to receive the brethren probably has special reference to some former visit of the Missionaries, when Diotrephes refused to receive them in spite of the commendatory letter which they brought with them. But the present indicates a general practice rather than a particular incident. The words may simply mean that D. will not recognize as true Christians the brethren who side with the Presbyter. He will recognize neither the Presbyter nor his followers. It is better, however, not to exclude the reference to Diotrephes' former ill-treatment of those whom the Elder now commends to Gaius. The question of the welcome to be given to those who went from place to place ὑπὲρ τοῦ ἰδίου ἀνώματος was an important one at the time, and probably for some time afterwards. Cf. Didache xii. 1, πᾶσι δὲ ὁ ἐρχόμενος ἐν ἰδίῳ δεχθήτω ἐπεὶ δὲ δοκιμάσαντες αὐτὸν γνώσεσθε, and the whole chapter, esp. § 5, εἰ δ᾽ οὐ θέλει οὖτω ποιείν, χριστέμπορος ἐστιν προσέγχετε ἀπὸ τῶν τοιοῦτων.

\[ \text{τοὺς βουλομένους} \] Cf. ἐπιδέχεσθαι. His custom is to put every hindrance in the way of their carrying out their wishes, or he actually prevents them. The description of his action does not decide his position. The words used express action possible either in the case of a "monarchical" bishop, or of an influential and self-willed leader.

\[ \text{ἐκ τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἐκβάλει} \] Jn. ix. 34†, is rightly quoted in illustration. But the difference in tense should also be noticed (καὶ ἐξεβάλον αὐτὸν ἕξω). Again a policy or practice is described rather than a single incident. And the words cannot be used to determine the exact position of Diotrephes. Even if he had already obtained the "monarchical" position he could not have inflicted the penalty of excommunication without the concurrence of the whole Church. And a leading presbyter might well succeed in forcing his will on the community. The words, therefore, only indicate the position of power to which he had attained. And they do not determine whether the sentence of excommunication had been actually carried out, either in the case of those who wished to receive the Missionaries to whom reference is made in this Epistle, or in any other case.

The suggestion of Carpzov, revived by Poggel, to make τοὺς ἄδελφους the object of ἐκ τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἐκβάλλει, involves a construction which is intolerably harsh. The writer's love of parenthesis, even if ἐπιθυμεῖν is the true reading in Jn. i. 15, hardly goes so far as this. And the arguments by which it is supported are not convincing: (1) Diotrephes could not have expelled those whose only offence was the desire to show hospitality to the Missionaries; (2) if he succeeded in preventing them from carrying out their wishes, why should he go further?

μὴ μιμοῦ τὸ κακόν] Cf. He. xiii. 7; 2 Th. iii. 7, 9. The use of φαῦλον is more frequent in this writer, but κακὸν is found in Jn. xviii. 23 (εἰ κακὸς ἔδαρχη σε μαρτύρησον περὶ τοῦ κακοῦ). It is not necessary to limit the writer's meaning to the examples of evil and good afforded by Diotrephes and Demetrius, especially as the conduct of the latter would seem to have needed apology. If two special examples are intended, they must be the action of Diotrephes, and that of Gaius and his friends who wished to show hospitality. But the writer's object is rather to set two courses of action in the sharpest possible contrast, and to help forward a right decision by showing the true character of the point at issue in all its simplicity. Viewed rightly, it is simply a matter of refusing the evil and choosing the good. There are times when the simplest platitude in the mouth of authority is the expression of the truest wisdom; cf. Mk. iii. 4 (=Lk. vi. 9).

ὁ ἀγαθοποιῶν ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστίν] Cf. τ Jn. iii. 9, 10. He who "does good" shows by his conduct that the inspiration which dominates his life and work comes from God. He who "does evil" shows similarly that he has not made even the first step towards union with God; cf. i Jn. iii. 6, πᾶς ὁ ἀμαρτάνων οὐ̣χ ἐῳράκειν αὐτόν (Dr. Westcott's note); Jn. iii. 3, 5.

For the use of ἀγαθοποιεῖν, κακοποεῖν, and cognate words, cf. 1 P. iii. 17, ii. 15, 20, iii. 6, iv. 19, ii. 12, 14, iv. 15. Several points of connection between 2 and 3 John and 1 Peter have been noticed by Dom Chapman in his articles on the historical setting of these Epistles.

12. \( \Delta \eta \mu \eta \tau \rho \iota \omega \) Nothing is known of Demetrius except what can be gathered from the Epistle itself. The conjecture that he should he identified with the Demas mentioned in the Pauline Epistles (Col. iv. 14; Phil. 24, and 2 Ti. iv. 10), and the less improbable suggestion of his identity with the Ephesian silversmith whose opposition to St. Paul is recorded in Ac. xix. 21 ff., have been referred to in the Introduction. Purely conjectural identification is hardly a branch of serious historical study. But the mention of Demetrius here may be interpreted in different ways. (i.) It is possible to regard him as a member of the Church of Gaius and Diotrephes, whose conduct had somehow or other given cause for suspicion, even if we cannot follow the ingenious attempts of Weiss to show that he must have been the leader of the Church to whom under the special circumstances of the case the Elder had sent his letter to the Church (ver. 9), and of whose attitude Gaius was uncertain, as he stood between the two parties (Weiss, p. 210).

(ii.) With greater probability he has been regarded as the bearer of the Epistle (3 Jn.). Wilamowitz and others are probably right in finding in this Epistle a commendatory letter on behalf of Demetrius and his companions. The special emphasis of ver. 12 is most easily explained, as Dom Chapman, Mr. Bartlet and others have seen, by the supposition that Demetrius had fallen under suspicion, though the grounds for such suspicion are altogether unknown. On the whole, the hypothesis which best suits the facts of the case which are known to us is that he was one of the Missionaries, perhaps their leader. The main object of the letter is to commend them to the hospitality of the Church of Gaius. This the Elder had already attempted to do in a letter written to the Church. But his object had been frustrated by the machinations of Diotrephes, who had succeeded in forcing his will upon the Church. Probably Diotrephes had found his task the easier because of suspicions felt about Demetrius, which were not altogether unwarranted. We cannot, however, say more than that of several possible hypotheses this is the most probable.

\( \dot{\alpha} \pi \alpha' \upsilon \tau \iota \s \tau \iota \varsigma \alpha \lambda \nu \theta \eta \varepsilon \iota \varsigma \varsigma \) Cf. Papias' quotation of the words of the Elder (Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 3), \( \dot{\alpha} \pi \alpha' \upsilon \tau \iota \s \tau \iota \varsigma \alpha \lambda \nu \theta \eta \varepsilon \iota \varsigma \) The tendency to personify the Truth is clearly marked in the Johannine writings. The relation of the Truth, as thus personified, to Christ and to the Spirit is not so clearly defined.
In view of the language of the Farewell discourses in the Gospel (cf. especially Jn. xvi. 13), and the statement of 1 Jn. v. 6, ὅτι τὸ πνεῦμά ἐστιν ἡ ἀλήθεια, there is much to be said in favour of Huther’s view, that the expression αὐτὴ ἡ ἀλήθεια is not merely a personification of Truth, but a description of the Holy Spirit. Against this, however, must be set the language of Jn. xiv. 6, ἐγώ εἰμι . . . ἡ ἀλήθεια. With this want of clearness we naturally compare the difficulty which is so often found in the First Epistle of determining whether the writer is speaking of the Father or the Son. The writer does not think in the terms of modern conceptions of personality as applied to the Godhead, or of the more precise definitions which were the result of the Trinitarian controversies. His function is rather to provide the material out of which later thought developed clearer definition.

In what manner the “Truth” is said to bear witness to Demetrius is a different question. Probably it is in so far as his life and conduct show those who know him that the ideal of Christianity has been realized in him, that he “abides in the truth.”

ὑπὸ πάντων] If any qualification of the words is necessary, that of Oecumenius will serve the purpose, τῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν ἔχοντων. And his further suggestion is appropriate, εἰ τις τὸ ὑπὸ πάντων καὶ ἓπι τῶν ἀπίστων ἐκλάβοι διὰ τὸ περιληπτικὸν τοῦ πάσας μορίων, οὐ κακῶς οὗτος ὑπολαμβάνεται, and also his comparison of S. Paul’s πάντα πάσιν ἄρέσκει. But the natural exaggeration of this use of πάντων, where the meaning practically is “all whom the matter may concern,” or “all who might be expected to do the thing spoken of,” is common in all language, and is best left to explain itself.

καὶ ῥμεῖς δὲ] For the construction, and also for the combination of the witness of men with the higher witness, cf. Jn. xv. 26 f. ἐκεῖνος μαρτυρῆσει περὶ ἐμοῦ καὶ ῥμεῖς δὲ μαρτυρεῖτε, ὅτι ἀπ’ ἀρχῆς μετ’ ἐμοῦ ἐστέ. The meaning of ῥμεῖς in these Epistles is often difficult to determine,—a difficulty which is unnecessarily exaggerated by the attempt to discover one meaning which it must have throughout. It is certainly unsatisfactory to find in it an expression for the αὐτόπται of the Province of Asia as often as Dr. Zahn suggests, a fact which his critics are never tired of emphasizing. But there are several passages in which the writer would certainly seem to mean by ῥμεῖς himself and all who can speak with authority as to the truth of Christianity and the teaching of Christ, and where he is, perhaps, thinking primarily of a company, most of whose lives “have passed into the unseen.” At any rate, he means something more than “I and those who are like-minded with me.” It is not altogether fanciful to suppose that the words of Jn. xv. 26 f. are in his mind as he writes. In the present verse, however, there is nothing to suggest that he means more than "we who are personally acquainted with Demetrius."

οἶδας κ.τ.λ. The close connection of this clause with Jn. xxi. 24, καὶ οἴδαμεν ὅτι ἀληθῆς αὐτοῦ ἡ μαρτυρία ἔστιν, is obvious. There is very little to determine which should be regarded as the echo of the other.

οἶδας] The plural of the Textus Receptus is not well supported, and the personal appeal to Gaius is more natural. Possibly the correction is due to the influence of the plural in Jn. xxi. 24.

The writer apparently makes his appeal to Gaius' knowledge of himself, and the trustworthy character of his witness in general. It is possible, however, that he is thinking of Gaius' knowledge of Demetrius, which would help him to judge of the truth of the Elder's witness in this particular case.

13. γράψαι... γράφειν] This is probably the true text, though the variants γράψαι—γράφειν are found. The use of the tenses is correct. The "much" which he has to communicate is naturally regarded as a whole, the aorist being used. But he does not wish to go on using pen and ink (γράφειν).

μέλανος] Cf. 2 Jn. 12.

καλάμω] The reed, the pen of the ancients, here takes the place of the writing material mentioned in 2 Jn. Cf. Ps. xlv. (xlv.) 1, κάλαμος γραμμάτως, Oxyrh. Pap. ii. 326 (p. 306) παρατέθεικα τῇ μητρὶ φιλουμένῃ τὸ βροχίον τοῦ μέλανος καὶ τοὺς καλάμους.

14. ἐλπίζω... ἰδεῖν] Cf. 2 Jn. 12, ἐλπίζω γενέσθαι πρὸς ὑμᾶς. The εὐθέως may possibly suggest that the intended journey is nearer than when 2 John was written. The action of Diotrephes, and perhaps of others in other places, may have brought matters to a crisis.

στόμα πρὸς στόμα] Cf. 2 Jn. 12 (notes).

eἰρήνη σοι] The Christian wish (cf. Jn. xiv. 27) takes the place of the usual ἔρρωσο, or ἔρρωσθαί σε εὔχομαι of ordinary correspondence.

ἀσπάζονται] In the private letter the private greetings are given instead of the general greeting of the members of the Church in the more formal Epistle (2 Jn. 13).

15. ἀσπάζου τοὺς φίλους κατ᾽ ὄνομα] These forms of greeting are part of the common stock of epistolary correspondence, and should not be pressed as evidence about the state of parties in the Church of Gaius. It is especially misleading to interpret κατ᾽ ὄνομα as a proof of the scanty following left to the Elder in it. Compare the greetings in the letter of Amon the soldier to his father (Berlin Museum: Deissmann, Licht von Osten, p. 118), ἄσπασαι Καπίτωνα πολλὰ καὶ τοὺς ἀδελφούς μου καὶ Ἀρματίαν καὶ τοὺς φίλους μου : and Oxyrh. Pap. ii. 123, ἀσπάζομαι τὴν γυναῖκάν μου θυγατέρα Μακκαρίαν, καὶ τὴν δεσπόιναν μου μητέραν ὑμῶν καὶ ὅλους τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς κατ᾽ ὄνομα: or Tebtunis Pap. ii. 299 (p. 422), ἀσπάζομαι τὴν γυναῖκάν μου καὶ τὰ παιδία μου καὶ Σεραπάμμωνα καὶ Ἀματίαν καὶ τοὺς ἐνοίκους πάντας κατ' ὄνομα.

APPENDIX.

THE OLD LATIN VERSION.

In the following pages an attempt has been made to show to what extent the Old Latin Version, or Versions, of these Epistles is known or can be recovered. With the exception of the first eight verses of 1 Jn. i., the whole of the First Epistle is contained in MSS which are predominantly Old Latin in character. The Fleury Palimpsest, edited by M. Berger in 1889, and more recently by Mr. Buchanan in Old Latin Biblical Texts, No. 5, contains 1 Jn. i. 8–iii. 20; the Freisingen Fragments, edited by Ziegler in 1876, contain 1 Jn. iii. 8 (apparuit filius) to the end of the Epistle. The Tractates of Augustine give us a complete text as far as 1 Jn. v. 3. For the first eight verses Augustine's text has been given till the Fleury Palimpsest begins (i. 8 -rimus quoniam). This is followed till iii. 8 in hoc, after which Ziegler's Freisingen Fragment is used. In the case of the Fleury Palimpsest, M. Berger's text has been used. Where Mr. Buchanan differs from M. Berger the readings of the former are added intra lineas.¹ This text is followed by an apparatus criticus in which the attempt is made to give the variants from this text which are found in the Vulgate (Vg.), in the text contained in Augustine's Tractates on the Epistles (Aug., quotations from other works of Augustine, which are only cited when they differ from the Tractates, are quoted as Aug.), and in the quotations from Latin writers whose works have been published in the Vienna Corpus. No quotations have been included from works not available in that edition, except in the case of Tertullian where Oehler has been used for treatises not yet published in the new edition, and Irenaeus (Stieren). The readings of the Perpignan MS, Paris Bibl. Nat. Lat. 321, which differ from the Old Latin text printed here and which are not Vulgate readings, have been added (under the symbol “p”) in the Critical Notes from the text of the Catholic Epistles, published by the Rev. E. S. Buchanan in the Journal of Theological Studies, xii. 48 (July 1911). The agreements of this MS in the First Epistle of S. John with Augustine and with the Speculum are of considerable interest. The form in which it gives the text of 1 Jn. v. 7, 8 is very close to that of one of the quotations in the Speculum.

¹ This refers to words and letters which both editors treat as legible, wholly or in part.

The use of an approximately Old Latin text as a basis, which ensures the presentation of variants which have a claim to be regarded as Old Latin, as the Vulgate readings are always given where they differ from the text printed, reduces the bulk in the case of those writers whose text is largely Old Latin in character. The amount of Patristic support for Old Latin readings would, of course, have been shown more clearly by the use of a Vulgate text as a basis. A table of Greek words and their renderings has been added which may serve to call attention to the more interesting renderings. The work is tentative in character and has not led to any very definite results.

It may, however, be noticed that the twelve verses of ch. iii., where we have the guidance of both MSS, show that the Freisingen text is closer to that of Augustine than is the Fleury MS, though the verses offer very little evidence that is decisive. The differences between h and Cyprian are noticeable, but they do not invalidate von Soden’s judgment as to the African character of the text of the Fleury Palimpsest (von Soden, p. 241 f.). And the general agreement between Augustine and the Freisingen Fragment can be clearly seen, though their texts are by no means identical. The independence of the version used by Lucifer of Cagliari is also very clearly marked. The evidence adduced also confirms the view that the tendency to add interpretative and explanatory glosses to the text of the Epistle is both widespread and dates back to early times. In view of the importance of the gloss which found its way into so many texts of 1 Jn. v. 7 f., this fact is not without interest. The growth of that gloss can be traced back at least as early as Cyprian. The following instances of this tendency should be noticed:

ii. 5. +si in ipso perfecti fuerimus, Aug.
9. odi[+homicida est et, Cyp.
16. ex concupiscentia saeculi, Cyp.
et filium et patrem, Cyp. Prisc. Spec. (Luc.)
iii. 1. propter hoc mundus non cognoscit nos quia non cognoscit eum et nos non cognoscit mundus, Aug.
7. (?) + sic ut et ille iustus est.
10. patrem suum] patrem suum aut matrem suam, Cyp. cod.
iv. 3. Sed est de antichristi spiritu, Cyp.
omnis qui soluit Iesum Christum et negat eum in carne uenisse, Aug. 1/8.
v. 1. deus in ipso est et ipse in deo, Spec.
20. + et carmem induit nostri causa et passus est et resurrexit a mortuis adsump sit nos, Spec.
aeterna] + et resurrectio nostra, Spec.

I JN. I.

Augustine, Comm. in Ep. Ioann.

1. Quod erat ab initio, quod audiuimus, et quod uidimus oculis nostris, et manus nostrae tractauerunt de uerbo uitae.
2. Et ipsa uita manifestata est, et uidimus et testes sumus, et annuntiamus nobis uitam aeternam, quae erat apud Patrem, et manifestata est in nobis.
4. Et haec scribimus uobis, ut gaudium uestrum sit plenum.
5. Et haec est annuntiatio quam audiuimus ab eo, et annuntiamus uobis, quia Deus lux est et tenebrae in illo non sunt ullae.
6. Quosdi dixerimus quia societatem habemus cum eo, et in tenebris ambulamus, mentimur, et non facimus ueritatem.
7. Quosdi in lumine ambulamus, sicut et ipse est in lumine, societatem habemus cum inuicem, et sanguis Iesu Christi, filii eius, purgabit nos ab omni delicto.

Fleury Palimpsest, ed. Berger, Paris, 1889.¹

1 Jn. i. 8. [si dixe] Rimus quoniam peccatum n habemus ipsos nos de cipimus ² et ueritas in nobis non est
9. Si confiteamur peccata nostra fidelis et iustus ut remittam nobis peccata et purget nos ex omni iniquitate

¹ Italics are used where the MS is illegible. M. Berger’s text is followed where the two editions “supply” different words. Where the “supplies” agree, italics are used only for what is regarded as illegible by both editors.
² cedueimus Buch.
10. quod si dixerimus quod non peccauimus mendacem faciemus eum et uerbum eius non est in nobis
   ii. 1. fili mei haec iscribo uobis ne peccetis et si quis peccauerit aduocatum abemus aput patrem ihu xpm iustum
   2. et ipse est exoratio pro peccatis nostris non pro nostris autem tantum sed et pro totius saeculi
   3. et in hoc iscimus quoniam cognouimus eum si mandata eius seruemus
   4. qui dicit se noscere eum et mandata eius non seruat mendax est in hoc ueritas non est
   5. nam qui custodit uerbum us in hoc caritas di perfecta est in hoc iscimus quoniam in eo sumus
   6. qui dicit se in ipso manere debet quemadmodum ille ambulauit et ipse ambulare
   7. Carissimi non nouum mandatum scribo uobis sed mandatum od uetus quem habuistis ab initio mandatum uetus est uerbum quod audistis

   8. iterum mandatum nouum iscribo uobis quod est uere in ipso nobis et in uobis quia tenebrae iam transeunt et lumen uerum iam lecut
   9. qui dicit se in lumine esse et fratrem suum hodie in tenebris est vsq. adhuc
   10. nam qui diliget fratrem suum in lumine permanet et scandalum in eo non est
   11. qui autem hodie fratrem suum in tenebris est et in tenebris ambulat et non scit ubi eat quia te | nebrae obscoecauerunt oculos eius
   12. scribo uobis filioli quoniam remittuntur uobis peccata propter nomen eius
   13. scribo uobis patres quoniam cognouistis quod erat ab initio scribo uobis iuuenes quoniam uicitis malignum

   14. Scribo uobis pueri quoniam cognouistis patrem quod cognouistis eum qui est ab initio scribo uobis adulescentes quoniam fortes estis et uerbum di in uobis permanet et uicitis malignum
   15. nolite diligere seculum nec ea quae sunt in saeculo si quis diliget saeculum non est caritas patris in eo
   16. quoniam omne quod est in seculo concupiscencia carnis saeculi est et concupiscencia oculorum et superbia uitae est quae non est de patre sed de seculo est

1 re (sic) Buch.
transiet et saeculum transit et concupiscentia qui autem facit bit voluntatem di permanet in aeternum
18. Pueri nouissima hora est et sicut audistis quoniam eantixps uenit nunc antixpi multi facti sunt unde cognoscimus quoniam nouissima hora est produit
19. Ex nobis exierunt sed non erat ex nobis nam si fuisset et ex nobis permansissent forsitan nobiscum sed ut praesto fiat quoniam non sunt omnes ex nobis
20. et uos uctionem accepistis a sto et nostis omnia
21. non scripsi uobis quasi ignorantib ueritate sed scientibus eam et quoniam omnem mendacium ex ueritate non est
22. quis est mendax nisi is qui negat quia is est xps hic est non antixps qui negat patrem et filium
23. omnis qui negat filium 1 | Nec patrem habet qui confitetur filium et patrem habet
24. uos quod audistis ab initio permaneat in uobis quod si in uobis permanserit quod ab initio audistis et uos in filio et patre permanebitis uobis
25. et haec est promissio quam ipse pollicitus est nobis uitam aeternam.
26. Haec scripsi uobis de eis qui seducunt uos.
27. et uos untionem quam accepistis ab eo permaneat in uobis et necesse non habelis ut aliquis doceat uos sed sicut untio eius docet uos de omnib et uerum est et non est mendum 2 et manete sicut docuit uos permanete in eo
28. et nunc filio manete in eo ut cum uenerit fiduciam habeamus et non confundamur ab eo In praesentia eis si nostis eum qui fidelis est
29. si scimus quoniam iustus est scitote quoniam omnis qui ueritatem de eo natus facit instiliam ex ipso natus est
iii. 1. ecce qualem caritatem dedit uobis pater ut filli dei uocaremur et sumus propterea seculum nos in honorate

1 negat filium] filium (sic) Buch.
2 mendum (sic) Buch.
2. Carissimi nunc filii dī sumus et nondum manifestatum est qui futuri sumus scimus quoniam cum apparuerit similes erimus ei quoniam uidebimus eum sicuti est 3. et omnis qui habet spem hanc in eo castificat se sicut et ille castus est 4. omnis qui facit peccatum et iniquitatem facit et peccatum est iniquitas 5. et scitis quoniam ille apparuit ut peccata tolleret et peccatum in illo non est 6. omnis qui in eo permanet non peccat omnis qui peccat non uidit eum nec cognouit eum 7. filiolii nemo nos seducat qui facit iustitiam iustus est omnis qui fa 8. qui autem fa | cit peccatum de diabolo est quia ab initio diabolus peccat in hoc.¹

1 JN. III.

Freisingen Fragment.

8. apparuit filius di ut soluat opera diaboli 9. Omnis qui natus est ex Dō peccatum non facit quia semen eius in ipso manet et non potest peccare quoniam de Dō natus est 10. Ex hoc manifesti sunt filii dī et filii diaboli omnis qui non facit iustitiam non est de dō et qui non diligit fratrem suum 11. Quoniam hoc est mandatum quod audistis ab initio ut diligamus imuice 12. Non sicut Cain qui ex maligno erat et occidit fratrem suum et cuius rei gratia occidit eum quia opera eius maligna erant fratris autem eius iusta 13. et nolite mirari fratres si odit nos hic mundus 14. Nos scimus quoniam transimus de morte ad uitam quia diligimus fratres qui non diligit permanet in mortem 15. omnis qui odit fratrem suum homicida est et scitis quia omnis homicida non habet uitam aeternam in se manentem 16. in hoc cognoscimus caritatem quia ille pro nobis animam suam posuit et nos debemus pro fratribus animas ponere. 17. qui autem habuerit substantiam huius mundi et uiderit

¹ The MS continues as far as ver. 20 (dī corde nostro et), so that for vv. 8–20 we have both the Fleury and the Freisingen text. The variations of the Fleury Palimpsest are henceforward noted, the text being taken from the Freisingen Fragment.
fratrem suum egere et clauسرit uiscera sua ab eo quomodo caritas di manet in eo
18. filioli non diligamus tantum uerbo neque lingua sed opera et ueritate
19. et in hoc cognoscimus qum ex ueritate sumus et coram ipso suademus cordi nostro
20. qum si reprehendat nos cor nostrum maior est di cordi nostro et nouit omnia
21. km si cor nm non nos reprehendat fiduciam habemus aput dm
22. et quidquid petierimus accipiemus ab eo qum mandata eius seruamus et quae sunt placita in conspectu eius facimus
23. et hoc est mandatum eius ut credamus nomini filii eius IHU XPI et diligamus inuicem sicut dedit nobis mandatum
24. et qui seruat mandatum eius in illo manebit et ipse in eo et in hoc scimus qum permanet in nobis de spu quem dedit nobis
iv. 1. Km nolite omni spu credere sed probate sps si ex do sunt qum multi pseudoprophetae prodierunt in hoc saeculo
2. hinc cognoscitur sps di omnis sps qui confitetur IHM XPM in carne uenisse ex do est.
3. et omnis sps qui non confitetur IHM ex do non est et hoc est illius antixpisti quem audistis quia uenturus est et nunc in saeculo est
4. iam uos ex do estis filioli et uicistis eos qum maior est qui in uobis est quam hic qui in saeculo est
5. hii de saeculo sunt propterea de saeculo locuntur et saeculum audit eos
6. nos ex do sumus qui cognoscit dm audit nos qui non est ex do non nos audit hinc cognoscimus spm ueritatis et spm erroris
7. kmi diligamus inuicem qum caritas ex do est et omnis qui diliget fratrem suum ex do natus est et cognoscit dm
8. qui non diliget ignorat dm quia ds caritas est
9. in hoc apparuit caritas di in nobis qum filium suum unicum misit di in saeculo ut uiuamus per eum
10. in hoc est caritas non quod nos dilexerimus dm sed qum ipse dilexit nos et misit filium suum propitiatorem pro peccatis nostris.
11. kmi si sic ds dilexit nos et nos debemus diligere inuicem
12. dm nemo uidit umquam quodsi diligamus inuicem ds in nobis manet et caritas eius perfecta est in nobis
13. in hoc cognoscimus quin in ipso manemus et ipse in nobis quin de spu suo dedit nobis
14. et nos uidimus et testamur quin pater misit filium suum salutarem saeculi
15. quicunque confessus fuerit quin IHS est filius di d in eo manet et ipse in do
16. Et nos cognouimus et credidimus in caritate quam habet ds in nobis ds caritas est et qui manet in caritate in do permanet et ds in eo manet
17. in hoc perfecta est Karitas in nobis... fiduciam habemus in diem iudicii quia sicut ille est et nos sumus in hoc mundo
18. timor non est in caritate sed perfecta caritas foras mittit timore quin timor poenam habet qui autem timet non est perfectus in caritate
19. nos ergo diligamus quin ipse prior dilexit nos
20. si quis dixerit diligo dm et fratrem suum odit mendax est qui enim non diliget fratrem suum quem uidet dm quem non uidet quomodo potest diligere
21. et hoc mandatum habemus a do ut qui diliget dm diligat et fratrem suum
2. omnis qui credit quia IHS est xps ex do natus est et omnis qui diliget genitorem diliget eum qui genitus est ex eo
2. hic cognoscimus quin diligimus filios di cum diligimus dm et mandata eius facimus
3. haec est enim caritas ut mandata eius seruemus et mandata eius grauia non sunt
4. quia omne quod natum est ex do uincit saeculum et haec est victoria quae uincit saeculum fides nostra
5. quis est autem qui uincit saeculum nisi qui credit quia IHS est filius di
6. hic est qui uenit per aquam et sanguinem IHS XPS et non tantum in aqua sed in aqua et sanguine et sps est testimonium quia sps est ueritas
7. qui tres sunt qui testificantur in terra sps et aqua et sps tres sunt qui testificantur in caelo pater et uerbum et sps ses et hi tres unum sunt
9. si testimonium hominum accipimus testimonium di maius est quia hoc est testimonium di quia testificatus est de filio suo
10. qui credit in filio di habet testimonium di in se qui non credit in do mendacem facit eum quia non credit in testimonium eius quod testificatus est ds de filio suo
11. et hoc est testimonium quæ uitam aeternam dedit nobis ds et haec uita in filio eius est
12. qui habet filium dī uitam habet qui non habet filium dī uitam non habet
13. haec scribo uobis ut sciatis quia uitam habetis aeternam qui creditis in ne fili dī
14. et haec est fiducia quam habemus ad eum quia quidquid petierimus secundum uoluntatem eius audit nos
15. et si scimus quia audit nos quidquid petierimus scimus qm habemus petitiones quas petiuiimus ab eo 16. si quis seiit fratrem suum peccare peccatum no ad mortem postulabit et dabint ei uitam his qui peccat non usque ad mortem est enim peccatum usque ad mortem non pro illo dico ut postulet
17. omnis injustitiae peccatum est et est peccatum ad mortem
18. scimus quæ omnis qui natus est ex dō non peccat sed natiuitas dī conservat eum et malignus non tangit eum
19. scim' quæ ex do sumus et totus mundus in maligno positus est
20. et scimus quæ filius di uenit et dedit nobis intellectum ut sciamus quod est ueru ef simus in uero filio eius IHU XPO hic est uerus ds et vita aeterna 21. filiolī custodite uos ab idolis.

In the following critical notes differences of order have not, as a rule, been noted except for the Vulgate, and the text found in Augustine's Tractates on the Epistle. An attempt has been made to indicate by fractions the proportion which the evidence for any particular variant in any writer bears to the whole evidence on the point in question to be found in his quotations of the passage. This has not been attempted in the case of Augustine, except for the Tractates (Aug.), where different readings have been noted in this way, when, as sometimes happens, more than one rendering is found in the text.

1. 1. erat] fuit Vg. Cass. | quod 2°—uitae] quod audiuiimus oculis nostris uidimus et manus nostrae contractauerunt de sermone uitae Tert. 7/8 | quod 2°—norris] quæ uidimus oculis nostris et auribus audiuiimus perspeximus Vg. Cass. :+perspeximus Amb. 7/6 ed. 1/6 | et 2°]+quod Ambcodd. 1/6 | tractauerunt] contractauerunt Vg. : palpauerunt Mur. Fr. Cass. :
perscrutatae sunt Amb. 1/6 : scrutatae sunt Amb. 7/6.
2. ipsa] om. Vg. Amb. 7/8 | manifestata est 1°] apparuit Amb. 9/2 | testes uita Amb. | manifestata est 2°] apparuit Vg. Cass. Amb-ed. : paruit Amb-
6. quodsi] si Vg. | quia] quoniam Vg. | societatem] communionem Tert. | ambulamus] incedamus Tert. | ureritatem non facimus Vg.
5. nam qui custodit] qui autem custodi Vg.: qui autem seruauert Aug.

20. si] non p. | reprehenderit Vg. | corde h. | et] expl. h.

24. mandata Vg. | manebit] manet Vg. | permanet] manet Vg.

21. hoc + ergo p. | a do | ab ipso Aug. | Luc. | ab eo p. | diligat | amat Luc. | diligit | amat Luc. |

4. quia quoniam Vg. | saeculum 1°, 2° | mundum Vg. |

5. quis qui p. | autem | om. Vg. | saeculum Vg. | mundum Vg. | credidit p. | quia quoniam Vg. |

9. accepimus p. | quia 1°—di 2° | om. p. | quia 1° | quoniam Vg. | quia 2° | quod maius est quoniam Vg. | testatus est Tert. |

12. Cf. qui filium non habet nec uiam habet Tert. | di 1° | om. Vg. |
APPENDIX 213

17. iniustitia] iniuitas Vg. | peccatum 1o, 2o delictum Tert.

ἀγαπᾶν . . . diligere h q Vg. Aug. (iii. 14) amare Luc.
,, q Vg. Aug. (iii. 23) , , Luc. dilixerimus q Vg. (iv. 10) amauerimus Luc. dillexiims Aug.
,, q Vg. Aug. (iv. 20) Luc.
,, q Vg. Aug. (v. 2) Luc.

ἀγάπη . . . caritas h Vg. (ii. 5) diletio Aug.
,, h q Vg. (iii. 16) , Aug.
,, h q Vg. (iii. 17) Aug. Cyp-cod. 1/4 agape Cypcod. 1/3.
,, q Vg. (iv. 8) , Aug. De rebap.
,, q Vg. (iv. 9, 10, 12, 17) diletio Aug. agape Cyp.
,, q Vg. (iv. 16) diletio Aug. Cyp. 1/2.
,, q Vg. Aug. (v. 3) , Aug. Luc.
,, Vg. (3 Jn. 6) , Hier.

ἀγαπητὸς . . . carissimus h Vg. (ii. 7) diletissimus Aug.
,, q Vg. (iv. 7, 11) Aug.
,, Vg. (3 Jn. 1) Aug.

ἀγγελία . . . mandaetum h q (iii. 11) annunciate Vg. Aug. repromissio Luc.

ἀγνίσεω . . . castificare h (iii. 3) sanctificare Vg. Aug.

ἀγρὸς . . . castus h (iii. 3) sanctus Vg. Aug.

ἀδικία . . . iniquitas h Vg. Aug. (i. 9) iniustitia Tert.
THE EPISTLES OF S. JOHN

iddiha . . . . iniquitas Vg. (v. 17) iniustitia q.
alpeus . . . . tollere h Vg. (iii. 5) auferre Aug.
altein . . . . petere, petere q (v. 15) petere, postulare Vg.
postulare q Tert. (v. 16) petere Vg. Hil. edotan . . . . postulare q Tert. (v. 16) rogere Aug. Cass.
alazoniata biou (ii. 16) superbia uitae h Vg.
ambitio saeculi Cyp. Aug.
mundi Cyp-cod. 1/4, humanae uitae Prisc.
allhous . . . . inuicem q Aug. (iii. 23) alterutrum Vg.
q Aug. (iv. 7) nos inuicem Vg. nos alterutrum Luc.
q Aug. alterutrum Vg. Luc.
" Aug. (2 Jn. 5) Vg. amartanein . . . . peccare h Vg. Aug. (i. 10) delinquere Cyp. Tert.
q Vg. (v. 16)
Tert. Hil.
amartia . . . . peccatum h Vg. Cyp. (i. 9) delictum Tert. Aug.
h Vg. (iii. 5) Tert. Aug.
aun . . . . forsitian h (ii. 19) utique Vg. Aug. Cyp. (om. ed. 1/5 cod. 1/3). afinei . . . . remittere h Vg. (i. 9) dimitte Cyp. Tert. Aug. Spec.
bios . . . . substantia q Vg. Cyp. facultates Aug.
ton genivosanta . . genetorem q (v. 1) eum qui genuit Vg. qui genuit eum Aug.
ton genovemenvon qui genitus est q Aug. (v. i.) qui natus est Vg. Spec.
b genivositis . . natuitas q (v. 18) generatio Vg. Aug. Cass.
gnivokein . . scire h Vg. (ii. 5) cognoscere Aug.
cognoscere q Vg. Aug. (v. 2) intelligere Luc.
dia touto . . . . proptera q (iv. 5) ideo Vg. Aug.
dikavon . . . . iustum h Vg. Cyp. Aug. (ii. 1) suffragatorem Cyp. cod. 1/6. eladon . . . . idolum q (v. 21) simulacrum Vg. Aug. Spec. etolh . . . . mandatum h Vg. Aug. (ii. 3) praeceptum Cyp.
q Vg. (v. 2)
Aug. q Vg. (v. 3)
Aug.
Vg. Luc. (2 Jn. 5)
" Aug.
elxelothasiv prodierunt q Aug. (iv. 1) exierunt Vg. Luc. Spec.
(propidit h (Buch.).
profecti sunt Vg. (3 Jn. 7) Hier. elxo balloi . . . . (iv. 18) foras mittit q Vg. Aug. Tert. 2/3. foras abicit Tert. 1/3. excludit foras Amb. eliuthia . . concupiscencia h Cyp. Vg. (ii. 16) desiderium Aug.
uluntas Prisc.
h Cyp. Vg. (ii. 17) desideria Aug.
plaamros . . . . (ii. 2) exoratio h.
propitiation Vg.
propitiator Aug.
placatio Tert. Hil. deprecatio Cyp.
? satisfactio et placatio Ad Vigil.
(iv. 10) propitiator q. propitiation Vg.
litator Aug.
extpiator Luc. kaathrfein . . . . purgare h (i. 9) emundare Vg. Tert. mundare Aug. Spec.
kaathos . . . . quemadmodum h (ii. 6) sic ut Vg. Aug. quomodo Cyp. Hier.
κληθῶμεν uocaremur h (iii. 1) nominemur Vg. appellemur Aug.

κόλασις poena q Vg. Tert. 1/2 (iv. 18) tormentum Aug. suppliciam Tert. 1/2.

κόσμος saeculum h (ii. 2) mundus Vg. Aug. (ii. 16) " h Cyp. (ii. 17) " Vg. Aug. Cyp.

λόγος h (i. 1) sermo Tert.

μαρτυροῦμεν (iv. 14) testamur q. testificamur Vg. testes sumus Aug.

μαρτυρεῖν (v. 7, 8) testimonium dare Vg. testificari q. testimonium perhibere De rebap. Euch. Vict. Vit. testis esse Amb.

μεταβεβήκαμεν (iii. 14) transimus h q. translati sumus Vg. h (Buch.) transitum fecimus Luc.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

μονογενής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

τελεῖος perfectus q Vg. Aug. (iv. 14) consummatus Aug.

περίχωντα perficere h Aug. (v. 7, 8) observare Vg. custodire Cyp. Luc.

παρακλητος advoce h Aug. (ii. 1) paracletus Faust. Vict. Vit.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.

πανογής unicus q (iv. 9) unigenitus Vg. Aug.
χρείαν ἔχειν. (iii. 17) egere q.

(cui) opus [est] h (Buch., necessitatem habere Vg. desiderantem Cyp.
esurientem Aug.

Collation of the Old Latin Text with the Greek (Ed. Nestle).

I. 1. o 3°] pr. et.
om. o θεασαμεθα.
2. η ζωη] ipsa uita.
mαρτυρουμεν] testes sumus.
Μια] in nobis.
3. o] quae.
kαι μιν] uobis.
μετα 1°] pr. sit.
μετα του πατρος] cum Deo Patre. μετα 2°] om.
του ιουν αυτου] post Χριστου.
4. ημεις] uobis.
ημων] uestrum.
7. αυτος] et ipse.
kαθαριζει] purgabit.
Ιησου] + Χριστου = Vg.
8. ουκ εστιν] post ημιν = Vg.
απο] ex.
10. εαν] quod si : si Vg.
ποιουμεν] faciemus.
II. 2. λαμπρος] post εστιν = Vg.
4. oτι εγνωκα] se noscere: se nosse Vg.: quia cognoni Cyp. kαι 2°] om.
5. ος δ' αυ] nam qui.
αυτου] post λογον = Vg.
αληθως] om.
7. εντολην] post καινην.
ειχετε] habuistis.
8. αληθες] uere.
παραγινεται] iam transeunt : transierunt Vg.
10. o] pr. nam.
13. τον απ αρχης] quod erat ab initio.
14. εγραψα 1°, 3°] scribe.
16. σαρκος] + est.
17. αυτοι] om.
18. και 2°] om.
22. ουκ εστιν] est.
23. εν υμιν 1°] post μενετω.
24. εαν] quod si.
27. μενει] permaneat: maneat Vg.
28. εαν] cum.
29. και 2°] om.
30. εξηλθαν]} ἢ prodiit.
31. ουκ] pr. quae.
32. οὐκ] pr. guae.
33. ἐχει] accepstis.
34. αλλ᾽ ειδατε] sed (+ quasi Vg.) scientibus.
35. οὐκ ἐστιν] est.
36. ἐν υμιν το] post μενετω.
37. και 2°] om.
38. εξηλθαν]} ἢ prodiit.
40. εληφθαν] nos egnorat (Buch.).
42. το] qui.
43. εαν] cum.
44. αυτω] post εσομεθα.
45. επ αυτω] in eo.
46. εκεινος] et ille.
47. καθως] et εκεινος] om.
48. το 1°] autem.
49. εν τουτω] ex hoc q: in hoc h Vg. Aug.
50. αυτη] αγγελια] hoc est mandatum ἢ q.
51. εκ] pr. et.
52. το] cum.
53. υμας] nos h q.
54. εγνωσκει] nos inhonorat (Ber.): nos egnorat (Buch.).
55. ἔχετε] accepstis.
56. μενει] permaneat: maneat Vg.
57. εαν] quod si.
58. εκ] pr. et.
59. εαν] quod si.
60. εαν] quod si.
THE EPISTLES OF S. JOHN

πεισομεν] suademus q: suadebimus h Vg.
20. η καρδια] cor nostrum h q.
οτι 2ο] om. h q Vg.
21. η καρδια μη] cor nostrum non nos.
22. λαμβανομεν] accipiemus.
23. ευτολην] post ημων.
ημων] post edokey = Vg.

IV. 2. en touto] hinc.
γινωσκετε] cognoscitur.
elηλυθοτα] uenisse.
3. μη ομολογει] non confitetur: soluit Vg.
ερχεται] uenturus est.
4. o 2ο—κοσμο] his qui in saeculo est.
5. αυτοι] hii.
αυτων] post akouei.
7. αγαπαν] + fratem suum = De rebapt.
8. ουκ εγνω] ignorat.
10. ιλασμον] propitiatorem.
αληθος] post αγαπαν.
12. τωποτε] post τεθεαται = Vg.
en ημων] post εστιν.
17. μεθ' ημων] in nobis.
εχομεν] habemus.
19. πρωτος] prior.
20. οτι] om.
εωρακεν (bis)] uidet.
ou] quomodo.
21. απ αυτου] a deo.
V. 2. en touto] hinc.
ton θεου] post αγαπωμεν 2ο.
3. γαρ] post εστιν = Vg.
ton θεου] om.
4. η νικησασα] quae uincit.
5. εστιν] + autem.
en to uδατι] post μονον.
to μαρτυρουν] testimonium.
7. μαρτυρουντες] + in terra.
aυμα] et tres sunt qui testificantur in caelo pater et uerbum et sps scs.
oi τρεις] hi tres.
In the above collation the Greek has been underlined when the Latin supports a Greek reading which differs from that contained in Nestle’s text. The differences between the Old Latin and Vulgate have also been marked. When the Old Latin agrees with the Vulgate the rendering has been printed in Italics, or the agreement has been noted by the symbol “= Vg.”; when the Vulgate differs from both the Greek and the Old Latin its rendering has been added; in all other cases the Vulgate agrees with the Greek against the Old Latin. For the “Vulgate,” Nestle’s printed text has been used. The amount of help to be obtained from the Old Latin in determining the Greek text is not great. There are, of course, but few passages in which there is serious doubt as to the true reading. But the collation brings out at least one interesting fact, in the number of instances where Greek variants are not involved, but where the Vulgate agrees with the Greek against the Old Latin. This shows the extent to which the Vulgate has revised a not very accurate translation into far closer conformity with the Greek text. The facts are of some interest in connection with the tendency which is clearly marked in the Old Latin to add interpretative glosses. In two passages the textual evidence of the Old Latin is of special interest. In iv. 3 the reading “non confitetur” supports the view which is suggested by the evidence of Cyprian and Tertullian that the original reading in Greek has μὴ ὁμολογεῖ and that the λέει (represented by the Vulgate “soluit” and apparently known to Tertullian) came into the Latin text as an interpretative gloss. In the more famous passage v. 7, 8 the Old Latin gives us the gloss in its earlier form in which the earthly witnesses precede the heavenly, as in the text of Priscillian, whose quotation of the passage is the earliest known evidence for the insertion. It is unfortunate that in both these verses we are dependent for our Old Latin text on Ziegler’s Freisingen Fragments, and have not the help of the Fleury Palimpsest, which, though not pure African, undoubtedly approaches nearer to the earlier forms of the Old Latin text.

In the case of the two shorter Epistles we have no help from MSS, except the last few verses (116–end) of the Third Epistle, which are extant in the Latin (only) of Codex Bezae, where they are found between the Fourth Gospel and the Acts, a position which perhaps suggests, as has been pointed out, that in this MS the Johannine Epistles were treated as an appendix to the Gospel.

It has therefore been possible to reproduce only the quotations of the Epistles which follow the Old Latin text or at least afford information about it. The words in these quotations which do not agree with the Vulgate have been printed in Clarendon type, in order to show how far the citations yield Old Latin evidence. A few have been added which are not contained in the Volumes already published in the Vienna Corpus. In their case the reference to Migne has been given with the number of the volume in his edition of the Father quoted. It may be worth while to tabulate the following renderings, in addition to those already given, which they attest:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>O. L.</th>
<th>Vulgate.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>ἀπολαμβάνειν</td>
<td>recipere (Luc.)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἐθνικός</td>
<td>gentilis (Hier.)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἐνώπιον</td>
<td>coram (,,)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἐργον</td>
<td>factum (Cyp.)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>καθώς</td>
<td>sicut (Luc.)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λαμβάνειν</td>
<td>admittere (Cyp.)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λαμβάνειν</td>
<td>accipere (Luc.)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>πλάνος</td>
<td>fallax (Luc. Spec.)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>προπέμπειν</td>
<td>praemittere (Hier.)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ως</td>
<td>sicut (Luc.)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

So far as it goes this evidence supports that which has been collected in connection with the First Epistle. The Bezan fragment, which has been collated with the Vulgate and also with the Greek (Nestle’s text has been used in both cases) again shows the usual Vulgate accommodation to the Greek, but suggests a Greek text further removed from that which Jerome made the basis of his Vulgate.
APPENDIX

The Speculum quotation of 2 Jn. 11 affords another instance of the addition of glosses. The words (ecce praedixi uobis ne in diem domini condemnemini) are found in some MSS of the Vulgate.

The text of the Perpignan MS in the two minor Epistles is mainly Vulgate. The following readings may, however, be noted:

2 Jn. 4 gauisus pr. Karissimi | 7 prodierunt | 8 custodite ne perdatis | estis | in Dno | 9 doctrina | eius | 12 per chartam et atramentum | per atramentum et in epistola | futurum | uenturum | electae | + ecclesie 3 Jn. 2 | egit | 4 gratia | 9 doctrina | eius | 12 per chartam et atramentum | per atramentum et in epistola | futurum | uenturum | electae | + ecclesie

2 Jn. 10, r1—Cypr. Sent. Ἐς. 81. "Si quis ad uos uenit et doctrinam Christi non habet, nolite eum admittere in domum uestrarn et aue illi ne dixeritis qui enim dixerit illi aue communicat factis eius malis."

2 Jn. 7—Priscillian, p. 30. "Qui non confitentur Christum Iesum in carne uenisse. Hic est seductor et Antichristus."

2 Jn. 7—Priscillian, p. 30. "Qui non confitentur Christum Iesum in carne uenisse, hi sunt seductores et antichristi."

7. "Oro te, domina, non siue mandatum novum scribens tibi, sed quod habuimus ab initio, ut diligamus nos alterutrum; et haec est caritas ut ambulemus secundum mandata eius. hoc est mandatum siue audistis ab initio ut in eo ambuletis.

7. "quoniam multa fallaces progressi sunt in saeculo qui non confitentur Iesum Christum uenisse in carnem; isti sunt fallaces et antichristi."

8. "uidete eos, ne perdatis quod operati estis, sed ut mercedem plenam recipiatis.

9. "omnis qui recedit et non manet in doctrina Christi deum non habet; qui autem manet in doctrina eius ille et patrem et filium habet.

et 1°—christo] a doctrina eius Luc. 1/3.

10. "si quis uenerit ad nos et hanc doctrinam non adfert, nolite accipere eum in domum et aue dicere ei;"
II. "qui enim dicit ei aue communicat operibus eius malignis.

2 Jn. 7—Gelasius i. ad Ep. Dardaniae. Ep. 79, p. 221. "Qui negat Christum in carne uenisse hic est antichristus."

2 Jn. 3—Augustine, ad Rom. c. 12 (Migne, iii. 2096) "Sit uobiscum gratia misericordia pax a Deo Patre et Jesu Christo Filio Patris."

2 Jn. 5—Augustine, De gratia et libero arbitrio, c. 35 (Migne, x. 903). "Non quasi praeceptum novum scribam tibi sed quod habuimus ab initio ut diligamus in uincem."

3 Jn. 1—Augustine, ad Rom. c. 12 (Migne, iii. 2096). "Senior Gaio dilectissimo quem ego diligo in ueritate."

3 Jn. 5—7—Jerome, In Titum, Lib. i. 701 (Migne, vii. 568). "Charissime fideliter facis quocumque operaris in fratribus et hoc peregrinis qui testimonium dederunt dilectioni tuae coram ecclesia quos optime facies si prae miseris Deo digne pro nomine enim Domini exierunt nihil accipientes a gentilibus."

2 Jn. 7—Spec. 315, 6, ed. Weihrich. "Quoniam multi fallaces prodierunt in hunc mundum, qui non confitentur iesum christum dominum nostrum in carne uenisse hii fallaces et antichristi sunt."

1 fallaces S.
2 dmn nrm ihm xpm M V L C.
3 om. in carne C.
4 hi L.
5 antecris tii S anticristi V.

2 Jn. 10, 11—Spec. 517, 4. 10. "Si quis uenit ad uos et hanc doctrinam non adfert, nolite eum recipere in domum et aue ne dixeritis ei."

11. "qui enim dicit illi aue communicat operibus eius malignis. ecce praedixi uobis ne in diem domini condemnemini."

3 Jn. 4—end.
1 in domo M.
2 habe S M1 aue M2 L C.
3 illi ne dixeritis M L C.
4 habe S aue M1.
5 diem S M L C.
6 condemnemini M C.

Codex Bezae (f. 415).

qui malefacit non uidit dm demetrio testimonium exhibetur ab omnibus et ab ipsa ueritate et nos uero testimonium perhibemus et scis testimonium nostrum uerum est plura habui scribere tibi sed nolo per atramentum et calamum scribere tibi spero enim protinus te uisurum et os ad os locuturum pax tecum Salutant te amici tui saluta amicos nomatim.

EPISTULAE IOHANIS III.

Explicit

incipit

Actus Apostolerum.

2. exhibetur] redditur Vg.

4. et nos uero] sed et nos Vg.

5. scis] nosti quoniam Vg.

6. plura] multa Vg.

7. nolo] nolui Vg.

9. enim] autem Vg. uisurum] uidere Vg.

10. locuturum] loquemur Vg. tecum] tibi Vg.

11. tui] om. Vg.

12. μεμαρτυρηταί] testimo-nium exhibetur.

15. σοι] tecum.

οἱ φιλοι] amici tui.
INDICES.

A. GENERAL.
B. AUTHORS AND WORKS.
C. GREEK WORDS AND PHRASES.
D. WORDS USED IN THE EPISTLES.
Ε. WORDS USED IN GOSPEL BUT NOT IN EPISTLES.

Roman figures refer to the Introduction.

A. GENERAL.

ABSOLUTE statements, writer's use of, 53.
Anointing, 55.
Antichrist, 49 ff., 59, 69 ff.
Antinomianism, 1 ff., 84.
Antiochus IV., 73.
Aorist, Epistolary, 42, 179. meaning of, 82, 131.
Apodosis, introduced by καί, 63.
Article, absence of, 51.
use of double, 6.
Assurance, xxviii., 98, 121, 141.
Atonement, Day of, 28.
Babylonian Myth, 69 ff.
Barkochba, xviii.
Belief, 103.
Blood, meaning of, in Jewish thought, 15.
Brotherhood, author's conception of, 39, 94.
Cain, interpretation of history οἵ, 92.
Chiliasm, lxxv ff.
Christology of Epistles, xvi, xx, 8.
Commandment, Old and New, meaning of, 33 ff.

Demas, lxxxiii.
Demetrius, lxxxii ff., 192 f.
Demonstrative, use of, for emphasis, vi.
Diotrephes, lxxxi, 187 f.
Docetism, xliiv ff., lxxvi.
Eschatology, xviii, xxi, 37, 51.
Ethical teaching of opponents, 1.
Eye-witnesses, 2.
False Teachers, the, xxxviii ff., 58 f.
Fellowship, 8, 15, 104, 120.
First person plural, use in these Epistles, 9, 13, 93, 122, 193.
Forgiveness, meaning of ἄφεσις in N.T., 20.
Genitive, after substantives, 5.
Glosses, 49, 138, 179.
Gnosticism, xxviii f., 29, 31 f., 83, 85.
Gospel and Epistles—
Common types of sentences, v.
Differences in minor points, xi.
External attestation, xxii.
Ideas common to both, viii f.
Limitations of Vocabulary, vii.
‘Originality’ of Author, x, xxiii.
Gospel and Epistles—
Parallels in Epistles to the Last Discourses, xxiv.
Peculiarities of Epistles, xiii.
Phrases Common to both, i ff.
References in Epistles to Gospel, xxiv ff.
Similarity and differences of style, v, xxii.

Heavenly Witnesses, the history of the Gloss, 154 ff.
Hospitality, duty of, lxxix, lxxx, 178, 184.

Intercession, 145, 147.
Itacism, 108.

Judaism, xli ff.

Knowledge, meaning in S. John, 29.

Love, teaching of Epistle on, 117 ff., 122, 125.

Monarchian tendencies in Epistles, xvi, xix.

Monarchical Episcopate, development of, lxxxviii.

Marduk, 70 ff.

Name, meaning of, in Jewish thought, 44.

Nominative absolute, use of, 60, 62.

Organization of Asiatic Churches, lxxxix f.

Paraclete, xx ff., 23 ff.
Parenthesis, 6, 80.
Parousia, 37, 66, 81.

Polemical aim of Epistles, xxvii, xxxviii ff.

Prayer, teaching on, 102, 144.
Propitiation, xviii, xxi, 28, 119.

Relative, infrequent use of, v.
Repetition, writer’s fondness for, 60.

Second and Third Epistles—Relation to the First, lxxxiv ff.; historical background of, lxxxiv ff.

Second Epistle—
Circumstances under which written, lxxxix.
Comparison with the Didache, lxxx.

Destination, lxxx.

Sin, meaning of ἁμαρτίαν ἔχειν in Gospel and Epistle, 17.

Sin unto death, 145 ff.

Third Epistle—
Circumstances under which written, lxxxi.
Relation to the Second, lxxxiii, 187 f.

Tiāmat, 69 ff.

Titles of Christ, 8, 16, 27, 58, 105, 131, 175.

World, the, meaning of, in S. John, 47, 92 f., 107.

B. Authors and Works.

Addai, Doctrine of, lix.
Apocalypse, use of Antichrist Legend, 77 f.

Athanasius, lxii.
Augustine, xxx, lxi, 3, 27, 43, 86, 113, 156.

Babut, 160.
Bacon, lii.

Bartlet, lxxxiii, lxxxv, 172, 182.
Baruch, Apocalypse of, 75.
Basilides, xliii.
Bede, 88 f., 133.
Bengel, 33.

Berger, 156 ff., 197 ff.
Bousset, 69.

Briggs, 3, 44.
Buchanan, 197 ff.
Burkitt, lxi.

Caius of Corinth, lxxxi, lxxxiv.
Carpocrates, xli vi ff.
Cassiodorus, xxx.
Cerinthus, xxv, xxxix, xlv ff., lxxvi, 58.

Chapman, Dom, lxxxii, lxxxiv, 169, 172, 181, 185.
Chrysostom, 25.
AUTHORS AND WORKS

Clemen, xxxix, xlii, 2, 59.
Clement of Alexandria, xxxi f., lvi, lx f., 111, 159, 169.
Clement of Rome, lii.
Coenen, 181.
Cyprian, lix, 155.

Daniel, Book of, 73, 75.
Deissmann, 27, 66, 151, 183, 195.
Didache, liv, lxxx, 107, 186.
Diognetus, liv.
Dittenberger, 67.

Ebrard, xxv.
Enoch, Book of, 27, 36, 74.
Epiphanius, xlii, xlvi ff.
Eusebius, lx f.
Ezra, Fourth Book of, 75.

Findlay, 3, 12, 55, 100.
Fulgentius, 161.

Gaius, 181.
von der Goltz, 111 ff.
Gunkel, 69 ff.

Haring, xxxiv ff.
Harnack, lxxxvii ff., 182.
Hermas, liv.
Hilgenfeld, xlviii.
Hippolytus, xlvi ff.
Holtzmann, i, xix, xxix, 118, 153, 168, 176.
Hort, xxxvii f.
Huther, xxix, 193.

Ignatius, xlv.
Irenaeus, xlii, xlvi ff., lv, lxi, 3, 111.

Jerome, lxi, 169.
Jülicher, lxxvi, lxxxi, 164.
Justin, lv, 81, 89.

Karl, 3, 42 f., 89.
Knopf, xlvi.
Künstle, 155 ff.

Law, xxxvi f., 17, 42, 128.
Lietzmann, lxi.
Lightfoot, xviii, xxii, xxv.
Lipsius, xlvi f.
Lücke, xxviii, xxxii, 168.
Lyons and Vienne, Letter, lv.

Mommsen’s Canon, lxi.
Muratorian Fragment, lvii.

Oecumenius, 115, 193.
Origen, lvii, lix, lxi, 25, 38, 112, 181.
Papias, liv, lxxv, lxxvii, 192.
Paul, S. Eschatological Teaching, 76 f.
Peshitta, lxi, lxi.
Pfleiderer, xliii, lxxv.
Philaster, xlvi.
Photius, lx.
Pirque Aboth, 80.
Pogge, 191.
Polycarp, xlv, lxi, lxxv.
Priscillian, 158.

Rendel Harris, lxxxvi, 155, 165, 167, 176.
Réville, xx, lxxvii.
Rönsch, 26.
Rothe, xxix, 1, 44, 88, 139.
Sabatier, lxi.
Sanday, xxvii.
Schlatter, 30, 40, 45, 92, 95.
Schmiedel, xliv, 30.
Schöttgen, 148.
Schwartz, xxii, lxxvi.
Sibylline Books, 74.
Socrates, 113.
von Soden, xxxii, lxiv, 60, 198.
Solomon, Psalms of, 75.
Spitta, 96.

Tacitus, 3.
Talmud (see Schlatter), 25.
Tertullian, lvii, 113, 133.
ps-Tertullian, xlvi.
Thoma, lxxxvi.

Weiss, B., li, 8, 83, 86.
Wellhausen, xxvi.
Westcott, xxxvii f., 23, 88, 113, 165.
Wettstein, 23, 47, 176, 184.
Wilamowitz, lxxxii, 183, 192.
Windisch, 3, 89 f., 177.
Wohlenberg, 89, 100, 149.
Wurm, xxxix, xlii, 1, 36, 59, 114.

Zahn, xxxv f., xlvi, lx, lxxxiii, 7, 112, 168, 193.
Ziegler, 164, 197 ff.
Zimmern, 27.
C. Greek Words and Phrases Explained.

ἀγαθοποιεῖν, 191.
ἀγαπητοί, 8.
ἀγαπητός, 34, 81, 117.
ἀγαπητός, 34, 56.
ἀγαπέω, 84.
ἀγέω, 84.
ἀδελφός, 38, 90.
ἀδικεῖν, 85.
ἀλαζόνεσθαι, 66.
ἀλείπτειν, 147.
ἀλλάσιος, 6.
ἀλλοθεία, 19, 170.
ἀλλωθεία, 151.
ἀμαρτίαι, 17.
ἀμαρτήσεως, 34, 45, 60, 88, 91.
ἀμαρτίαν ἔχειν, 17.
ἀμηχανία, 195.
ἀφέω, 20.
βαρός, 130.
βιος, 97.
γεννᾶσθαι, 68 f., 148.
γράφω, ἔγραψα, 41 ff., 46, 142, 187.
διδαχή, 177.
δοκιμάζειν, 107.
ἐάν, c. indic., 144.
ἐκαίνων, ἤν, 33, 84 f., 87, 124.
ἐκέλευσα, lxxx, 180.
ἐκέλευσα Ἰερών, 167.
ἐλθών, ὁ, 132, 134.
ἐντολὴν λαβεῖν, 172.
ἐπιστεύσεως, 189 f.
ἐρχεσθαι, 178.
ἐρωτᾶν, 147, 173.
ἐβδομαδίως, 182.
θαυμάζειν, 93.
θεᾶσθαι, 4.
ταξιν, definitive, 19, 80, 124, 130.
elliptic, vii, 54.
c. indic., 150.
καθαρισθεῖν, 16, 21.
καὶ, ὁ, 8.
καὶ νῦν, 64.
καὶ τοῦτο, 195.
καὶ ὁμορραγήσειν, 8.
κάλασιν ἔχειν, 125.
κόσμος, 47.
Κυρία, lxxx, 167.
λαμβάνειν, 178.
λόγος, 35.
λόγος τῆς ἀλήθειας, 5.
λυεῖν, 89, 111 ff.
μαρτυρεῖν, 135, 138 f.
μένειν, 33, 39, 53, 61, 64, 86, 123.
μετεῖν, 38.
μονογενής, 119.
μονολογεῖν, 108, 121.
μοῖς, 7.
οὕς, 31, 134, 152, 178.
ἐν τούτῳ, 116.
ἐν τούτῳ, 9, 100, etc.
παιδία, 43.
πάλιν, 36.
πᾶς, 31, 83 f.
c. negat., 54, 57, 94.
c. partic., vi.
παραψίσα, 65, 102.
πειδεύει, 99.
περιπατεῖν, 13 f., 174, 183.
ποιεῖν, 104 f., 128. πλάνος, 18.
ποιεῖν, τῆς ἀλήθειας, 14.
καλώς ποιεῖν, 185.
πιστεύειν, 183.
ποταπός, 80.
πρεσβύτερος, ὁ, 166.
πρός, 7.
σάφει, 1, 48.
ἐν σαφείς, 109, 175.
σκάνδαλος, 39.
σκάνδαλος, 39.
σκοτία, 12.
σκότος, 14.
συνεργός, 187.
τεκνία, 43, 57.
τηρεῖν, 30.
ταξιν, definitive, 19, 80, 124, 130.
elliptic, vii, 54.
c. indic., 150.
καθαρισθεῖν, 16, 21.
καὶ . . . δέ, 8.
καὶ νῦν, 64.
καὶ τοῦτο, 195.
καὶ ὁμορραγήσθαι, 8.
κόσμος, 47.
Κυρία, lxxx, 167.
χρίσμα, 55.
 aliqua, 51.
D. Greek Words used in the Epistles.

The figure in brackets after each word gives the number of times the word is used in the Johannine Epistles. The figure after each capital gives the number of times the word is used in the Book or Group of Books represented by the Capital.

J = Gospel according to John, M = Matthew and Mark, L = Luke, P = Pauline Epistles (excluding the Pastoral Epistles), Pa = Matthew and Mark, H = Hebrews, C = Catholic Epistles (excluding 1-3 John), R = Apocalypse.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Word</th>
<th>Use in Gospel</th>
<th>Use in Acts</th>
<th>Use in Pauline Epistles (excluding Pastoral Epistles)</th>
<th>Use in Matthew and Mark</th>
<th>Use in Luke</th>
<th>Use in Pastoral Epistles</th>
<th>Use in Hebrews</th>
<th>Use in Catholic Epistles (excluding 1-3 John)</th>
<th>Use in Apocalypse</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>ἀγαθοποιέω</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>19</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀγαθός</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1.5</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀγαπάω</td>
<td>31</td>
<td>39</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀγάπη</td>
<td>21</td>
<td>23</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀγαπητός</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀγγελία</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἅγιος</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἁγνίζω</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄγαλμα</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀδελφή</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀδελφός</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀδικία</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀδημοσία</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀδρακτικός</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀκούω</td>
<td>16</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀλαζονία</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀλήθεια</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀληθῆς</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀληθινός</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀληθῶς</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀλλά</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀλλὰ καὶ</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀλλ᾽ οὐ</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀλλήλων</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἁμαρτάνω</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἁμαρτία</td>
<td>16</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄν</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄναγγέλλω</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄνθρωποκτόνος</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄνθρωπος</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀνομία</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀντίχριστος</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀξίως</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀπαγγέλλω</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄνθρωποκτόνος</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄνθρωπος</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀναγγέλλω</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀδρακτικός</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀναγγέλλω</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄνθρωπος</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀναγγέλλω</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀναγγέλλω</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
GREEK WORDS USED IN THE EPISTLES

eἶδον (1) A³ P⁷ R¹: I. v. 21.

eἶδον (1) A³ P⁷ R¹: I. v. 21.

eἶδον (1) A³ P⁷ R¹: I. v. 21.
GREEK WORDS USED IN THE EPISTLES

μηδέ (2) J? M? L® A? P® H® C®
I. ii. 15, iii. 18.

μηδείς (2) M* L® A?! P% Pa? H! C®
R?: I. iii. 7; III. 7.

ITIL in.

μισέω (5) J) MS L7 P* Pa! H? CR:
Το εν Ὁ. IX, I. iv. 13; 15, iv. 20.

pais for Μ|9Ὲ1 1,2 Αἱ PS Pal Ce
I. 8.

μόνον (2) 1" M® L® A® P? Pa? H® C® 1 112) ν. Ὁ.

μόνος (3) ye M?!3 L? A? P!0 Pat H® CR:
:-1.-ii. 2, v.-6, II. 1.

νεανίσκος (2) M4 L! A': I. ii. 13, 14.

νεώ (6) J? L® C® R®:
I. ii. 13, 14,
iv. 4, v. 4 (bil), 5.

νικη (1) : I. v. 4.

νου (5) J® M® L® A® P® H® C®
R®:
I. ii. 18, 28, ii. 2, iv. 4, II. 5.

ξένος (1) M5 A® P® H® C®:
III. 5.

δ'θεν (1) M® L® A® H® C®:
I. ii. 18.

οἰκία (1) J® M® L® A® P® H® C®
R®:
I. ii. 2, v. 19.

ομοιο (1) J? M® L® A® P® H® C®
R®:
I. iii. 2.

ομολογώ (6) J® M® L® A® P® H® C®
R®:
I. i. 9, ii. 23, iv. 2, 3, 15,
II. 7.

δνωμα (5) J® M® L® A® P® H® C®
R®:
I. iii. 12, iii. 23, v. 13,
III. 7, 15.

δράω (8) J® M® L® A® P® H® C®
R®:
I. i. 1, 2, 3, iii. 2, 6, iv. 20
(bil), III. 11.

δσις (2) J® M® L® A® P® H® C®
R®:
I. i. 2, iii. 20.

δταν (1) J® M® L® A® P® H® C®
R®:
I. v. 2.

δτι (78).

οδ (57).

οδέ (2) J® M® L® A® P® H® C®
R®:
I. ii. 23, iii. 6.

οδέλεις (2) J® M® L® A® P® H® C®
R®:
I. ii. 23, iii. 6.

οδείς (2) J® M® L® A® P® H® C®
R®:
I. iii. 10.

οδή (1) J® M® L® A® P® H® C®
R®:
I. iii. 2.

οδέ (1) J® M® L® A® P® H® C®
R®:
I. iii. 10.

οδυς (5) J® M® L® A® P® H® C®
R®:
I. ii. 22, v. 6, 20, II. 7, 9.
The use of the nominative only, sing. and plur., has been recorded.
E. Words used in the Gospel but not in the Epistles of S. John.

| | |
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>'Αβραάμ (10).</td>
<td>ψευδομαί (1) M1 A1 P4 Pa1 C1 R1: I. i. 6.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀγαλλίω (2).</td>
<td>ψευδόπροφήτης (1) M3+1 L1 A1 C1 R3: I. iv. 1.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀγγέλλω (2).</td>
<td>ψεῦδος (2) J1 P4 R3: I. ii. 21, 27.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἁγιάξω (4).</td>
<td>ψιλάφαω (1) AS Χς.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀγοράζω (3).</td>
<td>ψυχή (3) 119 M6+8 Ls Als pis 775 Cle</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄγω (12).</td>
<td>ὡρα (2) J36 M21+12 L16 A12 P7 R10: I. ii. 18 (bis),</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀθετέω (1).</td>
<td>ὃς (sic) (2) J13 M40+20 L29 A31 P130 Pa10 H21 C45 R70: I. i. 7, ii. 27, II. 5.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>αἰγιαλός (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Αἰνών (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>αἰτία (3).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄκανθαι (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄκανθινος (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀκοή (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀκολουθέω (19).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀλείφω (2).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀλέκτωρ (2).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἁλιεύω (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀλλαχόθεν (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄλλομαι (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄλλος (34).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἁμαρτωλός (4).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀμὴν ἀμήν (25)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>αἰνω (4).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀναπίπτω (5).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀνάστασις (4).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀνάγινώσκω (1)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀνάκειμαι (4).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀναπίπτω (16).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀναβαίνω (16).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀναληφτόν (3).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀναβλέπω (4).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀνάρχησις (2).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀνατρέπω (2).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀναχωρέω (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ἀνδρέας (5).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄνεμος (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀνήρ (8).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ἀννας (2).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀνοίγω (11).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀνιστήθην (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀντλέω (2).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄντλημα (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἄνω (4).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀντίλεγω (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀπάρτι (2).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀπάρτι (2).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀποβαίνω (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀπολύω (5).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀποθνήσκω (28).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀποκρίνομαι (78).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀποκτείνω (12).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀποκόπτω (2).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀπόκρυφα (21).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀποστολάω (1).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀποδημούχω (28).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀποκαλύπτω (3).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀποκόπτω (2).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀποκρίνομαι (75).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀπόκρυφα (2).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀποκτείνω (12).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ἀπολώ (5).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Words Used in Gospel But Not in Epistles</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-----------------------------------------</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>διώκω (2), δοκέω (8), δόλος (1), δόξα (17), δόλος (22), δούλευο (1), δοῦλος (11), δό (13), δώδεκα (6), δωρεά (1), δωρεάν (1), δύο (13), δώδεκα (6), δωρεά (1), δωρεάν (1)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Πρώτη σελίδα του λεξικού</td>
<td>'Ιωσήφ (Mariae maritus) (2), 'Ιωσήφ (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------------------</td>
<td>-------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κάγώ (31).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>καθαίρω (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>καθαρισμός (2).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>καθαρός (4).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>καθάζομαι (4).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>καθήμαι (4).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>καθήσω (2).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Καιάφας (5).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κατά (4).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κατάψυχος (10).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κατάβασις (18).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>καταβολή (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κατάγνυμι (3).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>καταλαμβάνω (3).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κατεσθίω (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κατηγορεώ (2).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κατηγορία (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κάτω (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Καφαρναούμ (5).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Κέδρος (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κεηρία (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κέρμα (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κερματιστής (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κηφᾶς (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κήπος (4).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κηπερά (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κήπος (4).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κλάσμα (2).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κλέφτης (4).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κλέφτω (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κλῆμα (4).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κλῆρος (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κλίνω (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Κλωπᾶς (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κοιλία (2).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κοιμάμαι (2).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κοιμώμαι (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κοιλιώμαι (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κολυμβητής (1).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κόλπος (2).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>κολυμβήθρα (4).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Greek Word</td>
<td>Count</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------------</td>
<td>-------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κομψότερον</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κοπιάω</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κόπος</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κόφινος</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κράβαττος</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κράσω</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κρανίον</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κρατέω</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κραγάζω</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κρίθινος</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κρίμα</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κρίνω</td>
<td>19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κρυπτός</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κρυπτω</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κυκλεύω</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κυκλόω</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κύριος</td>
<td>52</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>κώμη</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λαγχάνω</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Δάσαρος</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λάδια</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λαμπάς</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λαός</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λατρεία</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λέντιον</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λευείτης</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λευκός</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λῃστής</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λιθάζω</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λίθινος</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λίθος</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λιθόστρωτος</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λίθωσις</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λογίζομαι</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λόγχη</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λοιδορέω</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λούω</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λύκος</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λυπέω</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λύπη</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>λύχνος</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Μαγδαληνή</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μαθητής</td>
<td>78</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μαθηματικός</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μακάριος</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μακάριον</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μάλλον</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Μάχαρα</td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Μαρία</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Μαρία, Μαρία</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ματθαίος</td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μαστιγώ</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μάχαιρα</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μάχομαι</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μέγας</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μεθερμήνευομαι</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μεθύω</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μέλει</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μελλω</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μέν</td>
<td>8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μέντοι</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μέρος</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μέσος</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μεσίω</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Μεσσίας</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μεσότος</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μετά</td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μεταξύ</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μέτρον</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μετρητής</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μη, ου μη</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μηίτι</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μήποτε</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μήτηρ</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μήτι</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μητρός</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μηματία</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μηματίων</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μηματέων</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>μημόνοι</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Μουσής</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ναζαρέτ</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ναζωραῖος</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ναυαγίαλ</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ναός</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ναός</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ναός</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ναός</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ναάρος</td>
<td>8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>νέος</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>νεύω</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Νικόδημος</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>νηστήρ</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>νηστώς</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>νοέω</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>νομή</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>νόμος</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>νόμιμος</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>νυμέλη</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>νυμφιόν</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>νύξ</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>νύσσω</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ξηραίνω</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ξηρός</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ψηφιάνος</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ψηφός</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table> οδηγέω (1).
οδός (4).
δίς (1).
οδώνων (4).
οικοδομέω (1).
οίκος (3).
οἴμαι (1).
οῖνος (6).
δοκώ (2).
δομοίων (3).
δομοῦ (3).
δομος (1).
διάρμου (1).
διός (1).
δοσ (3).
δισίω (7).
διπλών (1).
διπτών (30).
διπως (1).
δραγή (4).
δρος (4).
ορφανός (1).
δρος (10).
δαπέων (1).
δε (21).
οδ (3).
οδέσποτε (1).
οδέσπω (3).
οδικεί (12).
οδικόω (1).
οὐρανός (20).
οὐτοι (5).
οὔχ (7).
δρας (1).
δύγλος (20).
δύναμιν (5).
δύπα (2).
δύος (2).

παιδάριον (1).
παιδίσκη (1).
παις (1).
παίω (1).
πάντοτε (7).
πάντοτε (7).
παράγομαι (2).
παραδίδωμι (15).
παρακύπτω (1).
παραλαμβάνω (2).
παραμυθέομαι (2).
παρασκευή (3).
παρέμειο (2).
παρήστημι (2).
παροιμία (4).
παράσιτος (1).
παράσιτης (1).
παροιμία (4).
παράσιτος (1).
παράσιτης (1).
παράσιτης (1).
πατήρ (1).
Πειλάτος (20).

πεινάω (1).
περαδίκω (2).
περιπτω (32).
πενθέρος (1).
περιτοχέλαω (2).
πέντε (5).
πεντήκοντα (2).
πέραν (8).
περι, c. acc. (1).
WORDS

USED

IN

πρό (9).

GOSPEL

BUT NOT

IN

σκηνοπηγία (1).

προβατικός (1).

σκηνόω (1).

πρόβατον (19).
πρός, c. dat. (3).
προσαιτέω (1).

σκορπίζω (2).

προβάτιον (2).

προσαίτης (1).

προσέρχομαι (1).
προσκόπτω (2).
προσκυνέω (10).
προσκυνητής (1).
προσφάγιον (1).
πρότερος (3). προτρέχω (1). πρόφασις (1).
προφητεύω (τ).

προφήτης (14). πρωί (2).

πρωία (1).
πρῶτον (8). πτέρνα (1).
πτύσμα (1).
πτύω (1).
πτωχός (4).

πυνθάνομαι (I).
πῦρ (1).
πυρετός (1).
πωλέω (2).

πῶλος (1).
πωρόῳ (1).

ῥαββεί (8).
ῥαββουνεί (1).
ῥάπισμα (2).

ῥέω (1).

ῥῆμα (12).

“Ῥωμαῖος (1).
“Ῥωμαϊστί (1).

EPISTLES

σκληρός (1).
σμύρνα (1).
Σολομών (1).

σός (6).
σουδάριον (2).
σπεῖρα (2).
σπείρω (2).

σπήλαιον (1).
σπόγγος (1).
στάδιος (2).
σταυρός (4).

σταυρόω (10).
στέφανος (2).
στῆθος (2).
στήκω (2).
στοά (2).

“στρατιώτης (6).
στρέφω (4).

συγγενής (1).
συκῇ (2).

συλλαμβάνω (1) συμφέρω (3).

σύν (3).

συνάγω (7).
συναγωγή (1).
συνέδριον (1).
συνεισέρχομαι (2).
συνέρχομαι (2).
συνήθεια (1). συνμαθητής (I).
συνσταυρόω (1).
συντελέω (1).
συντίθεμαι (1).
συντρίβω (1).
συνχράομαι (I).
σύρω (1).
Συχάρ (1).

σάββατον (14).
Σαλείμ (1).
Σαμαρείτης (4).
Σαμαρεῖτις (2).

σφραγίζω (2).

Σαμαρία (3).

σώζω (6).
σῶμα (6).

Σατανᾶς (1). σεαντοῦ (9).

σημαίνω (3).

σημεῖον (17).

Σιλωάμ (1).
Σίμων (ΠέτροΞ) (22).
Σίμων (3).
σῖτος (1).
Σιών (1).

σκανδαλίζω (2).
σκέλος (3).

σκεῦος (1).

16

σχίζω (2).

σχίσμα (3).
σχοινίον (1), σωτηρία (1).

ταράσσω (7).
ταραχή (1).
τάχειον (2).
ταχέως (I).
ταχύ (1).

τε (3).

τελευτάω (1).
τελευτή (2).

τέλος (1).

241


τέρας (1). tεσσάρες (2).
tεσσαράκοντα (1).
tεταρταῖος (1).
tετράμηνος (I).
Τιβερίας (3).
tίκτω (1).
tιμάω (6).
tιμή (1).
tίτλος (2).
tολμάω (1).
tόπος (17).
tοσοῦτος (4).
tότε (10).
tράπεζα (1).
tρέχω (2).
tριάκοντα (3).
tριακόσιοι (1). tρίς (1).
tρίτον (4).
tρίτος (1).
tρώγω (5).
tόπος (1).
tυφλός (16).

ψιχής (7).
νάρια (3).
νυκτερινός (3).
νυπνατόμος (4). νυπνάνθησις (1).

ἀπείρω (1).

οῦχ (1).

ψιχοι (4).
ψιχόω (1).

ῳδε (5).

ὡς, conj. (21).

ωφελέω (2).
Pride i wag oka: Αbenhavn
— δὲ,

—are <table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Call Numbers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Brooke, A. E.</td>
<td>Johannine epistles</td>
<td>BS 491.16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>v.43</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>